The word "added," after very mature consideration by your committee, was adopted because of the fact that there is to be found in nature's products, as she produces them, poisonous substances, to be determined by analysis. Nature has so combined them that they are not a danger or an evil—that is, so long as they are left in the chemical connection in which nature has organized them; but when they are extracted by the artificial processes of chemistry they become a poison. You can extract poison from grain or its products, and when it is extracted it is a deadly poison; but if you leave that poison as nature embodied it in the original substance it is not a dangerous poison or an active agency of poison at all.

So, in order to avoid the threat that those who produce a perfectly legitimate article from a natural product might be held liable because the product contained nature's poison it was thought sufficient to provide against the adding of any new substance that was in itself a poison, and thus emphasizing the evils of existing conditions in nature's product. That is the reason the word "added" is in the bill. Fusel oil is a poison. If you extract it, it becomes a single active agency of destruction, but allow it to remain in the combination where nature has placed it, and, while it is nominally a poison, it is a harmless one, or comparatively so.

As to the amendment proposed in the next paragraph, commencing on line 11, it has been sent doubtless to every member of this body. I have hundreds of them that have been received, of course, at the instigation of some common center of movement, but all emanating from what is known as the "distillers" or "liquor interest" of the country, which proposes to strike out on line 13 the words "and such fact is not plainly stated on the package in which such liquor is offered for sale."

What fact? The fact that "it is blended or rectified or consists of an admixture of different grades of the same liquor"—now, mark you—"or contains, or is mixed with, other substances." Those are the words they want to modify, not to strike them out. They were too wily for that.

Mr. HOPKINS. Where is that in the bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. In lines 12 and 13, on page 10. They were too wily to propose to strike those words out; but under the advice of shrewd counsel as to the interpretation the court would place upon certain words of limitation they have suggested that the words "and the label of the package in which such liquor is offered for sale does not contain the word 'blended' or 'rectified' or 'vatted.'" Those are the words of limitation that they desire substituted, so that under the well-established rule of interpretation of the words and phrases it will be held to limit the scope and intent of the entire paragraph. So that unless liquor comes within one of those three classes it will not come under the purview or within the scope and intent of any part of the paragraph. They become words of limitation.

Every lawyer knows and must see the effect of the objection. It would be very easy for these rectifiers or blenders or concoctors of bogus liquors to invent a new name for their process and leave all reference to it off of the bottle, and if they were before the court upon the charge of violating this law they would say, "We have not violated the law; these are not blended goods, these are not rectified goods, these are not vatted goods; these are goods under some other process that was not mentioned or forbidden by the provisions of the statute." That is what they are after. They want to leave the field open to themselves, so they may change the name of the process and yet perform the same act and work the same evil against this trade.

I at first looked at these words and saw that they had practically repeated the words contained in the first line of the paragraph, and I was almost thrown off my guard, until, upon a closer inspection and viewing it in the light of the interpretation the court would place upon it, I saw what they were after. I suspected them, then, when they came here with such an amendment.

Now, I desire to place all Senators upon guard against that amendment—plausible on its face, insidious in its power for harm to this bill. So much for that. We must not adopt those words of limitation. If we do, we might as well strike out that provision of the bill. If I am not right, why do they want it?

The bill provides as follows——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask the Senator to allow me a moment. The bill provides as follows:

First, if it is blended or rectified, or consists of an admixture of different grades of the same liquor, or contains or is mixed with other substances, and such fact—is not plainly stated on the package in which such liquor is offered for sale.

That is, those enumerated facts—

What objection can there be to stating those facts upon the package unless the avoidance of doing so is to work them some gain in avoiding the pains and penalties of this statute?

Now I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I rose because the Senator, as I understood him, had concluded his remarks, so far as the amendment I offered is concerned. I rose only that I might inquire what is the programme. I supposed when I offered my amendment that I would be allowed to address the Senate in support of it before anyone attacked it. But the order is reversed by the action of the Senator. I do not complain of that, but at some time or other, of course, I want to answer what the Senator has said about the amendment. I will do it now, or do it later, if it suits the Senator's pleasure that he should go on to the discussion of some other points.

Mr. HEYBURN. In reply to the Senator, I would say that when I gave notice on the day of adjournment last Thursday that I would call this bill up at the end of the routine business this morning for discussion it was suggested that the discussion of these amendments would probably not be taken up until the day fixed for the vote, and it was my intention this morning, I will not say to draw the fire of Senators, but to bring up these questions and at least present my views as chairman of the committee in regard to the amendments at this time, and thus invite the attention of Senators offering the amendments, that they might be taken up now.

I would be very much pleased, indeed, to yield the floor in order that the Senator from Ohio might present his views. I want to say before doing so that when we take up again the question, if we do take up the question, of readjusting the unanimous-consent agreement I shall ask that the Senators in charge of the bill may not be confined to ten minutes in replying to those who have practically an unlimited time, because when attacks are made and remarks are made in support of amendments we must meet them fully in order to sustain the bill which your committee has presented to the Senate.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I recognize fully what the Senator has said as to the necessity of his having an opportunity to meet amendments that may be offered and that which may be said in their support, and I certainly have no disposition to interfere with the Senator's pleasure in that regard.

I offered this amendment this morning after I had some days ago told the Senator that I was requested by many of my constituents to do so unless he would accept it, only because I understood from the Senator's remarks that when the bill was taken up this morning he desired that at this time we would offer our amendments and take them up for discussion. However that may be, I will waste no more time upon it.

I only want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that I offered this amendment without pretending to know as much about it as I perhaps should know. I offer it because I am in receipt not of a few letters and telegrams, nor scores, but hundreds from constituents living in my State, engaged in the liquor business in one form or another, asking me to offer the amendment. I do not know who prepared it. I know nothing about it. I know I did not prepare it. I never saw it until it was sent to me through the mail. I know some of the men who have written to me, but most of them I do not know. Those whom I do know I can vouch for, at least so far as I shall make any reference to them here this morning, as men of honorable and good standing in every way in the community where they live and where they do business. I do not think they are men who would engage in an effort to get into a bill in a sly way something that would give them an unjust advantage, something that Senators would not understand, something that would be an imposition in the results which would flow from it upon those who would be interested in this legislation.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. DICK. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The junior Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I will ask the junior Senator from Ohio if under the agreement he will consent to waive his right to the hour and allow me to take the floor on the measure that has just been under consideration.

Mr. DICK. Mr. President, with the understanding that the unfinished business shall be temporarily laid aside I will be very glad to yield to the Senator from Mississippi, it being understood that the unfinished business shall be resumed at the conclusion of his speech.

Mr. MONEY. I thank the Senator.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me, I will occupy only a very few minutes.

Mr. MONEY. Certainly; just as much time as you wish.

Mr. FORAKER. I will occupy only a very few minutes in answering the remarks made by the Senator from Idaho, in charge of the bill, and then I will yield the floor. I will be very much obliged to the Senator if he will allow me to conclude my remarks at this time. I have some other engagements that will take me out of the Chamber.

I was speaking of the character of men who have written to me. I was saying that they are not men who would undertake to do anything in a sly and improper way. I can not vouch for those whom I do not know, but I want to read the character of letters I have been receiving, and I read only from those of whom I have a personal knowledge and for whom I can vouch as being honorable men who would not act except in an honorable, legitimate, and straightforward way. Addressing me, this writer, H. F. Corbin & Co., of Cincinnati, Ohio, says:

H. F. CORBIN & CO., WHISKIES DISTILLERS,
425 East Pearl Street, Cincinnati, Ohio, February 9, 1906.

Hon. J. B. FORAKER, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: You will be receiving inclosures similar to the one we send herewith—

Which is this amendment—

as this idea embodies the sentiment and desire of every upright wholesale whisky and liquor merchant in the United States, as evidenced by resolutions of the National Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association and also the various independent State organizations, our own Ohio Wine and Spirit Association among the number.

There is no objection on the part of the liquor trade to a pure-food bill, in fact it is something which the better element of the trade has desired for years; but while that is a fact it does not seem just to impose such an unfair, unreasonable, and uncommercial requirement as is embodied in the original bill.

When the trade gracefully acquiesced to every requirement excepting this one, because of its unfairness, it certainly seems that this injustice should not be permitted, and we trust you will use your best endeavors and stand out against it for the welfare of those who are necessarily obliged to place their faith, reliance, and confidence in you.

Yours, respectfully,

H. F. CORBIN & CO.

I submit, Mr. President, that does not read like it was written by a man who was wanting to perpetrate an imposition on the public by getting in a sly and improper way something into a bill that should not be there. It impressed me as coming from an honorable man just by the character of the letter; but aside from that I knew it was from that character of a man.

Here is another letter from the Star Distillery Company, of Cincinnati, Ohio, one of the most reputable of the business houses of that character in our city. They say:

THE STAR DISTILLERY COMPANY,
Cincinnati, Ohio, February 10, 1906.

Hon. J. B. FORAKER, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: We desire to address you in regard to the provisions of the pending Heyburn pure-food bill. We inclose herewith a copy of page 10 of said bill, showing what words we would like to have left out, for if these words should be in the final bill, it would act detrimentally to the interests of our business.

In the labeling of a barrel or a package containing blended whisky, we do not consider it objectionable to use the words "blended" or "vatted," but it would be directly against the interest of our blended business to be compelled to brand or print the formula of such a blend on each package, as it would be publishing to our competitors the exact contents of such a blended article upon which we have used many years' knowledge and experience in successfully introducing such an article to the trade. You will no doubt agree with us that anything which would compel us or any other firm in the liquor business to publish the secret knowledge of our different formulas would be unfair.

In this connection we wish to say that we are heartily in favor of the provisions which prohibit the sale of any liquors adulterated, or which contain any ingredient of a poisonous or deleterious character, and we shall always be ready to assist the Department in prohibiting the sale of such liquors.

Thanking you in advance for your careful consideration of our communication, we remain,

Respectfully, yours,

THE STAR DISTILLERY COMPANY.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Right there it might be well to ask the Senator the question, What portion of the Heyburn bill requires that the formula for blended whisky should be published?

Mr. FORAKER. I was about to come to that. I will speak of it right away, if the Senator will allow me to do so.

Mr. McCUMBER. My understanding I may say of the bill is that there is not a single thing that requires it, but on the contrary the bill is so drawn that it prevents any attempt to compel a disclosure unless there are impure ingredients put into the liquors themselves in addition.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, that may be true, but it is not clearly the proper construction of the language that has been employed. I spoke to the Senator having the bill in charge about this matter a few days ago. I asked him to interpret the language that had been employed, for I understood it was claimed that there was a provision in the bill which would apply to these goods that exempted the sellers of them from putting on their label the formula which the writer of this letter called my attention to particularly. My attention, when I made inquiry about it, was called to the following language at the top of page 10, preceding the amendment:

Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as requiring or compelling proprietors or manufacturers of proprietary goods which contain no unwholesome added ingredients to disclose their formulas of production, except in so far as the provisions of this act may require to secure freedom from adulteration or imitation.

That was the language to which I was pointed as exempting the dealers in blended whiskies from putting on the label words showing what the formula for the blend was.

But when I made inquiry as to the exact meaning of "proprietary" goods (and I made inquiry of quite a number of my brother Senators) I was told by every one of them that that had relation solely to patent medicines.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator will remember that I called his attention, upon his making inquiry of me, to line 13 on page 10, which prescribes what shall be stated on the label, and that being the requirement and the only requirement, and being one made to specifically apply to the label, the law would so construe it that no other thing than that prescribed would be required to be upon the label.

Mr. FORAKER. So the Senator did call my attention to it, or I called his attention to it, I am not sure which did it first. We both saw it. I had read the bill repeatedly; I was not ignorant of the language there, but I was in doubt as to what the language meant, and I wanted to get from the Senator who had charge of the bill and who had employed this language a true construction of it, that I might know whether there was any basis for the alarm which these constituents are manifesting.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. FORAKER. Certainly; but if the Senator will allow me I would like to get through.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will promise to detain the Senator but a moment. Inasmuch as I yielded to the Senator before I reached this point, which I will proceed to take up, I would like to call the Senator's attention to the language to which I have just referred. It says:

If it is blended—

Referring to the liquor—

or rectified, or consists of admixture of different grades of the same liquor, or contains or is mixed with other substances, and such fact is not plainly stated—

The word "fact" relating to the enumerated conditions that are specified in the former part of the paragraph; and the word "fact" would never be construed to go beyond them. It would be sufficient to state that fact in the language of the statute itself under any rule of construction.

Mr. FORAKER. I agree with the Senator's proposition, generally stated; but when you come to construe that language and apply it to a particular case, then the trouble begins. If they blended whisky, there is no question but that the printing of the word "blended" would meet the requirements of the statute. If it be vatted goods, using that word——

Mr. HEYBURN. Vatted goods are not there.

Mr. FORAKER. I know; not there. Or if it would be rectified goods, the use of the word "rectified" would be sufficient. But now the Senator introduces into the bill other language. It is, after passing by blended or rectified goods, "or consists of an admixture of different grades of the same liquor, or contains or is mixed with other substances." Now, that fact must be stated also. But how would the Senator state it?

Mr. HEYBURN. In the words of the statute.

Mr. FORAKER. Put all this on?

Mr. HEYBURN. There are only five or six words.

Mr. FORAKER. We will say "mixed goods." Would that answer the requirement of the statute?

The gentlemen who write me say they are afraid the construction of that language would be such as to require them to put their formula on the label, and they do not want to put their formula on.

If the bill intends nothing more than to require them to say "mixed goods" or "blended goods" or "rectified goods" or "vatted goods," there is no objection to it; but I submit the Senator owes it to an important trade, addressing us as they do—I mean the trades who are interested in this proposition—addressing us unanimously from all over the country, to make his bill plain.

If one of these gentlemen were to ask me for a construction, I would not have any trouble about the blended goods; I would not have any trouble about rectified goods; I would not have any trouble about vatted goods. I do not know exactly what vatted goods mean.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not use the term, because it does not mean anything.

Mr. SPOONER. What does it mean?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know what it means. If some one will bring me a dictionary, I will find out. I would be obliged to some Senator if he will look at it while I proceed.

When I come to this last clause I find where I would have trouble. If the Senator were appealed to by one desiring to label goods which had been made up of an admixture of goods, what would he advise him to put on the label as a sufficient compliance with the statute?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will reply to the Senator. I would advise him to state in the language of the statute that this package contains an admixture of liquor or other substances.

Mr. FORAKER. That the Senator thinks would be sufficient?

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to give the Senator the reason for the incorporation of that language. Upon the analysis of a large number of samples they were found to contain sometimes as low as 5 and 10 per cent of liquor, and the balance was made up of various substances of anything other than liquor. Now, it was intended to cover that class of cases.

Mr. FORAKER. I have no objection to the Senator having on the label all he wants to have there, if he will omit the formula, which is, of course, a trade secret. I do not understand that the gentlemen who are writing me have any objection to his having there all that he thinks ought to be there, as he has now explained himself; but what they want is that the bill will tell them what ought to go there. They have no objection to putting on that their goods are blended, or that their goods are rectified, or that their goods are mixed goods; but there ought to be some general term, like the term "blended," that would satisfy the law, and they should not be required by an uncertain statement that might be so construed to require them to expose on the label the formula by which they mix their goods. That is all that I think they want.

Now, I wish to speak of this particular amendment, as the Senator did, answering first as to the word "added," which the amendment provides shall be stricken out in line 8. I listened to the Senator's explanation of it with much interest and appreciation. I thought when the amendment came to me and I read it and saw the word "added" stricken out that that was a very proper amendment. Now, listen to what the language is that is to be thus amended:

> In the case of liquors, an article shall be deemed adulterated if it contain any added ingredient of a poisonous or deleterious character.

Why should it be an "added" ingredient of a poisonous or deleterious character before it is required to be published to the world as an adulterated mixture? It seems to me that every kind of ingredient that is deleterious or poisonous ought to be stricken out.

The Senator speaks of fusel oil. I do not know much about it. I only have heard that it is a dangerous oil, and it may be that the Senator's explanation is sufficient. I did not realize, however, that there was the kind of difficulty to be met with which he suggested; but it does not seem to me that the explanation he gives is such that the word "added" should be left in the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to state to the Senator that on Saturday a representative of a number of the largest combinations of importers in the United States came over from New York to confer with me in regard to the amendments to which the Senator from Ohio is directing his attention, and after explaining them as I have explained them here to-day, this representative of these importers told me that my explanation was entirely satisfactory and that he was prepared to say for those whom he represented that they would no longer press the amendments. Their objection was simply because they did not understand the legal import of those words. As to the word "added," he admitted, from his personal knowledge of the manufacture of liquors, that it was wisely inserted in the bill, because the liquors in their natural condition already contain poisons that might be extracted from them, but which unextracted did no harm.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I have not heard from the gentleman whom the Senator converted to indifference as to this amendment, if not actual hostility to it, much less of his desire to have the amendment withdrawn. So I must be excused for having offered it, for I have heard only one request from my constituents, and that is that this kind of amendment should be offered to this bill and should be put into this bill if we could succeed in doing so, and the request is founded, as it seems to me, on just grounds.

I do not know that there is much more that I want to say. If the word "added" serves any good purpose there, I do not object to its remaining; but gentlemen who are entirely familiar with this business do not think that it does; and to the average layman it would seem that any kind of an ingredient ought to be stricken out, whether it might be added or not, that was poisonous or deleterious in the alcohol in its natural state before it was rectified, blended, or vatted.

I will now tell the Senator what "vatted" means, as I have been informed by the dictionary.

I read the definition of the word "vatted:"

> Vatted.—Stored or treated in a vat. Vatting.—The process of being vatted.
> Vat.—1. A large vessel, tub, or cistern, especially for holding liquids or for treating something in liquid during a manufacturing process, as in brewing or in tanning; usually named from the operation that it serves, as heating vat, dipping vat, draining vat. 2. A liquid or dry measure used especially in The Netherlands. 3. Metal. (1) A wooden tub in which to wash ore. (2) A chamber connected with a calcining furnace for drying tin ore.

I think I have read enough.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say to the Senator that on Saturday I asked this man what "vatted" meant, and he said, "Being put into a vat for the purpose of doctoring." That was his definition, and I think it a very good one.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator think that this word "vatted" is at all essential to what he seeks in this bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. The bill does not use the term. That was in an amendment which has been offered.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me that should be stricken out. I do not know what force there is in it. What does the Senator from Ohio say about it?

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator from Maine will allow me, I will answer it as I understand it. The bill, as drawn, provides in the section that is to be amended, according to this proposition, that if the liquor "is blended or rectified, or consists of an admixture of different grades of the same liquor, or contains, or is mixed with other substances," that such fact shall be stated on the package in which such liquor is offered for sale; that fact shall be stated on the label—that is to say, if it be blended, it must say "blended;" if it be rectified, it must say "rectified." There is no trouble down to that point.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me only a minute, I wish to answer the Senator from Maine. The trouble arises in construing the language which follows after the word "rectified." That relates to an admixture; and the word "vatted" is employed in the amendment I have offered to indicate that it is an admixture. If the liquor be blended, the label must have on it "blended;" if rectified, the word "rectified" must appear; and if vatted, that must appear. If, as the Senator suggests, the word "vatted" means "being doctored," it would notify everybody to steer clear of vatted goods.

Mr. HALE. I will say the impression made upon the ordinary mind is that that word is entirely unnecessary in the Senator's amendment. He does not need that.

Mr. FORAKER. What word would the Senator suggest, I ask him?

Mr. HALE. It seems to me that word is not at all essential.

Mr. FORAKER. The only reason I think it to be essential is that I have learned from letters that have been written to me that the men engaged in this business are of the opinion that the language employed would require them to print on their labels the formula by which they manufacture their goods; and that is all they want to escape.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator refer to the word "added?"

Mr. FORAKER. No; "vatted," not "added;" I have passed that; but in reference to the blended or rectified goods the bill says that the fact must be put upon the label. It says the fact must also be stated if the goods consist "of an admixture of different grades of the same liquor," etc. They claim that that would be done, I suppose, by a vatted process; they want the word "vatted" to indicate that the goods had been treated in that way.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say, if the Senator will indulge me, that the word "vatted" is so broad that it means that they may put the liquor in a vat and do anything to it. They would know liquor had been vatted for some unholy purpose. Let me call the attention of the Senator to an instance which actually occurred, as I understand——

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me to encroach upon his time but a moment further, I wish to call his attention to an instance of very recent date. I would say that I take this from a New York paper, a dispatch that is undoubtedly authentic, because I called the attention of the gentleman who was here on Saturday to it, and he said it was undoubtedly true:

WOOD ALCOHOL FOUND IN COMMUNION WINE—NEW YORK HEALTH COMMISSIONER FINDS IT A CONCOCTION OF POISON, ANILINE DYE, AND CIDER.

NEW YORK, February 14, 1906.

Health Commissioner Darlington will begin at once ordering arrests for adulteration of food and drinks sold in New York. One of the cases will be brought against a concern from which a sample was bought of communion wine, which upon analysis proved to be a combination of wood alcohol, aniline dye, and a poor quality of cider.

Many of the arrests will be of sellers of adulterated sirups such as are used in soda water.

"One of the most general forms of adulteration," says Dr. Darlington, "is that of sirups, many of which have been found to be nothing but chemical products. As to the communion wine in which wood alcohol was found, I understand that it was purchased in the regular way at a large establishment and was sold as a superior article.

"Arrests will be made at first, as test cases, one in each of the principal classes of food and drinks. In the case of the adulteration of drugs, we shall wait until the law is amended by the legislature, a bill for that purpose having been already introduced."

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, what the Senator has read does not add anything to what we are discussing, nor does it help anything.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was going to suggest, if I may, that that is the kind of a decoction or concoction that is made in vats; and that is the product to which the provision of this bill that is proposed to be stricken out, or so limited as to be ineffective, is directed.

Mr. FORAKER. Then the word "vatted" would be notice of that fact. I am just as much opposed to the preparation of such goods and the selling of them in the market as the Senator can be. I will go as far as he will go in order to correct any such imposition as that on the public. But that is not the point at issue at all. The men who are engaged in blending and rectifying goods are not all making decoctions of that kind, and those who are in that business in a legitimate way want to be protected against such a thing as that.

Mr. HEYBURN rose.

Mr. FORAKER. If the Senator will allow me to proceed I will be obliged, but if he is going to interrupt me every time I speak a sentence I shall never be able to get through.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will indulge me——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PERKINS in the chair). The Senator from Ohio declines to yield.

Mr. FORAKER. No; I do not decline to yield. I only requested the Senator to allow me to conclude the sentence.

Mr. HEYBURN. I was only going to say that if the gentlemen the Senator is speaking for—pursuant to these letters, I presume—are not interested in men who are doing this, I do not know why they should put this amendment to the Senate to protect men who are doing this kind of business.

Mr. FORAKER. I was about to tell the Senator why I understand they want this amendment. "Blended" would indicate such goods as they are dealing in. "Rectified," the same. But "vatted goods" would indicate, if the Senator be right—and I do not know anything about it—the kind of goods they are not manufacturing, and that term "vatted" would protect them and the public from that sort of injury. But the reason they wanted the word "vatted," as I understand from their letters—I do not know anything else about it and have not talked with any of them on the subject—is that they do not want to be required, if that be the meaning of the statute, to print their formula on the label. I asked the Senator what was required, and he said that was not required. If that be not required, it occurred to me it might be made plain by inserting another word, and I was about to call his attention to that, leaving out what they have suggested:

That nothing in this act shall be construed as requiring or compelling proprietors or manufacturers of proprietary medicines or goods, etc.

The Senator from Idaho interrupted me to say that this provision against requiring the formulas to be printed applied to this class of goods that these people write to me about. The only question is whether or not the words "proprietary goods" will be construed to mean only patent medicines, or whether they will be construed to mean any kind of goods for which a man has acquired the right to use a label. If that word should go in, there would be no trouble.

Mr. McCUMBER. On page 9, just before that, the Senator will observe that—

In the case of mixtures or compounds, which may be now, or from time to time hereafter, known as articles of food sold under their own distinctive names.

All of those blended goods have their own distinctive names.

Mr. FORAKER. My correspondents are perfectly satisfied, as I understand from all these letters, to put on the labels any general words short of the formula that will indicate the character of their goods. They do not object to that. If the Senator can think of some word that will suit better than "vatted," there would not be any objection, I am sure. Any one word would give as much information as to the character of the admixture as the words employed by the Senator in the bill—and he has had it before him—would give. They would be perfectly satisfied to put on the label that the mixture is of a different grade or the same grade. That is the language of the statute. That would not give anybody information as to the formula.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I was absent from the Chamber for a few moments, and I do not know exactly what point in the bill is being discussed, but I have heard some mention made here of adulterated liquors in vats and tanks, and all that sort of thing. I should like to have the Senator tell me just what is proposed to be done here.

Mr. FORAKER. I am at a great loss to know how to make a satisfactory answer to the Senator, because this is a matter which I have taken up from a sense of duty to my constituency and those appealing to me for what they think would be only fair treatment in this bill. I have exhibited a great many letters here—I have received hundreds of them—asking me to offer an amendment to this bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. At what point?

Mr. FORAKER. To change the language employed on page 10 so as to strike out the word "added," in line 8, thereby prohibiting any ingredient of a poisonous or deleterious character, instead of prohibiting the "added" ingredient. The Senator who has the bill in charge has explained why the word "added" was employed, and he may be right about it.

Mr. TILLMAN. Possibly I can explain to the Senator what is meant. I have studied this whisky question a little. I used to be head barkeeper, as they called me in South Carolina, when the dispensary was inaugurated there, and I know a good deal about it.

The added ingredient would be some adulterant for the purpose of coloring or to give it some flavor. There might be a more dangerous ingredient that would be in the spirits as they come from the still, and that is fusel oil, the most deadly of poisons. The mean liquor—what is known as the "meanest of mean liquor"—is due to the fusel oil that is in the crude alcohol instead of deodorized alcohol from which fusel oil has been extracted. That would not be added, because it comes from the corn.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not think that ought to be used as a beverage under any circumstances.

Mr. TILLMAN. Neither do I.

Mr. FORAKER. I would so amend the bill, if whisky in its natural state has a poisonous ingredient in it that is dangerous to life and health, as to prohibit the sale of it. I wish the Senator, out of the abundant knowledge that he has of this trade, would frame an amendment prohibiting the sale of liquor that has any fusel oil in it. Such an amendment would not do anybody any harm and might do a great deal of good.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will explain further what little I know about it. The bulk of the whisky sold in the United States has, as the basis of its manufacture, spirits—that is, alcohol carried to the highest point of distillation, which is 95 per cent of alcohol and 5 per cent of water. If you carry it any higher, it ignites. There are two kinds of alcohol. One has fusel oil in it, which comes with the grain and gives the flavor; the other has the fusel oil taken out and is known as "deodorized alcohol," and is the basis of every fine blended whisky in the world.

Mr. HALE. What is fusel oil?

Mr. TILLMAN. Fusel oil is that chemical property which rests mainly in the hull of the grain and in the peeling of the fruit. It gives flavor, and it is a deadly poison. Therefore, new liquors, fresh from the still, are very dangerous to health and very injurious. You have to wait and age them for a year or two or three or five years before the fusel oil that is left in the liquor changes to ether of one kind or another and gives the nutty flavor of which connoisseurs are so fond. I am not an expert in the taste of whisky, but I know a little about how it is made. I never could tell whether whisky was good or bad or indifferent by the taste. The only guaranty I can offer as to purity is to have the man who wants pure whisky get it from the Government bonded warehouse before any rectifiers or blenders have tampered with it.

Mr. FORAKER. Further answering the Senator's question, the other part of the amendment I offered relates to lines 13 and 14, to strike out the words "and such fact is not plainly stated on the package in which such liquor is offered for sale" and to insert what follows in quotations. The Senator perhaps has not the same print of the bill that I have.

Mr. TILLMAN. Let us go back to line 8, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. FORAKER. I have got through with that.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have not got through with it, however.

Mr. FORAKER. The Senator can discuss it with the Senator who has the bill in charge.

Mr. TILLMAN. No; I want to discuss it with the Senator from Ohio, whose constituents are pleading with him to try and protect them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. FORAKER. I will see how much the Senator wants to say about it. I was about to conclude my remarks on that point after I had secured the reading at the desk of a letter from a Cleveland manufacturer.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator can put the letter in at any time.

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know this gentleman, but he wrote me a very intelligent letter. He presents the argument much better than I can. I do not know much about the matter. I ask the Secretary to read the letter. It will give better information than I can give.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read the letter, as follows:

CLEVELAND, OHIO, February 3, 1906.

Hon. J. B. FORAKER, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I again address you in reply to your esteemed favor and documents sent me under date January 20.

As stated in my previous letter, I knew nothing about the amendments; but I have since investigated the matter, and I learn they were recommended by Mr. Warwick M. Hough, of St. Louis, Mo., who is, as you no doubt know, the attorney for the National Wholesale Liquor Dealers' Association of America, for reasons as follows:

Amendment 1 was suggested in the interests of the health of the whisky consumers, who ought to be protected against too large a percentage of fusel oil in their whisky. The amount of fusel oil which is contained in any straight distillate depends entirely upon the care which the distiller exercises in watching the fermentation and then in stopping the distillation when the vapor temperature rises above the boiling point of ethyl alcohol; and when any straight distillate contains a large percentage of fusel oil it always represents the efforts of the distiller to get the largest possible yield from a bushel of grain.

For this reason also the word "added," in line 8, is asked to be erased, because, although the fusel oil has not been added, still it is contained in the whisky.

By leaving the word "added" the whisky consumer is not protected against the fusel oil. I believe you will see the point.

In regard to amendment 2, it seems perfectly plain that the words "such fact," line 13, relate to the word "substances," same line, under which a statement of ingredients or formula could be required, and for this reason it is asked that line 13, beginning after the word "substances," and all of line 14 be erased; and as a safeguard, and to make it perfectly plain that all that is required is to have the mixture labeled as to indicate blended or rectified goods, we ask the amendment be added.

The third amendment, to strike out lines 15, 16, 17, 18, is asked, because the object intended to be covered by that provision is already covered by section 3449, Revised Statutes, United States, and do not think it best to have two laws applying to same subject, as the enforcement would be under different departments and officials.

I wish to thank you for calling my attention to the amendments, as it gave me the opportunity to explain them.

I am heartily in favor, as are all reputable wholesalers, that a pure-food bill be passed, but we want it just to ourselves as well as to the public.

I feel that if a proper food bill is passed by Congress it will give the different States a guide to go by, hence the importance of this matter being thoroughly looked into before passed.

I wish to add in connection I learn that Mr. Wiley is working to have the name "whisky" apply only to goods at 100 per cent. If for no other reason than to form temperate habits this should be defeated, as it would have a tendency to prejudice people against lower-proof whisky, and to drink the goods at 100 per cent and higher, which is too strong, in my opinion. I think for the health of the consumer the lower the proof the better.

Mr. Hough is well versed on these matters, and if it is not asking too much I would like you to give him an interview at your convenience, and I have informed Mr. Hough of my request to you.

Again thanking you, I am, yours, very truly,

S. BUHRER.

Mr. FORAKER. In view of the discussion we have had and the conference I have just now had with the Senator in charge of the bill and other Senators, while the letter was being read, I move to amend on page 10, in line 3, of the bill, after the word "proprietary," by striking out the word "goods" and inserting the words "foods, drugs, or liquors;" so that it will read:

Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as requiring or compelling proprietors or manufacturers of proprietary foods, drugs, or liquors which contain no unwholesome added ingredients to disclose their formulas of production, except in so far as the provisions of this act may require to secure freedom from adulteration or imitation.

Mr. MONEY. I understood that there would be no vote today on any of the amendments.

Mr. FORAKER. No.

Mr. MONEY. Does the Senator want a vote on his amendment now?

Mr. FORAKER. I offer the amendment now to have it voted on when it is reached, if there be any objection.

Mr. MONEY. Very well.

Mr. FORAKER. Then I will let the other amendment stand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Ohio will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 3, after the word "proprietary," it is proposed to strike out the word "goods" and to insert "foods, drugs, or liquors;" so as to read:

Provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as requiring or compelling proprietors or manufacturers of proprietary foods, drugs, or liquors which contain no unwholesome added ingredients to disclose their formulas of production except in so far as the provisions of this act may require to secure freedom from adulteration or imitation.

Mr. FORAKER. Let the amendment be printed and lie on the table until it is voted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, such will be the order of the Senate.

Mr. MONEY and Mr. TILLMAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] is recognized.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator from Mississippi will yield to me for a moment, I hope, as I "butted in," as the phrase is, and I desire to explain my position a little more clearly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. I want to say that I was a little bit hurried because I was speaking in the time of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will get through as soon as I can. I may take some time a little later on. I will address such remarks as I want to make now to the word "added," in line 8, which the correspondents of the Senator from Ohio want stricken out.

I will explain that so far as my investigations went—and I tried to go very thoroughly into the matter—I discovered that pure whisky is very rare. Most people do not like it for the reason that it has, as is stated in the letter just read, too much alcohol in it. Whisky ought to be distinguished into two classes. There is whisky that comes from the still and is never tampered with at all, except to add distilled water to get the necessary percentage of alcohol by reduction; and whisky that is manufactured or rectified. All blended and rectified whiskies, as I said a moment ago, have, as a basis, spirits—that is, alcohol, either deodorized or not. The deodorized alcohol is the purest form of alcohol in the world. It has no poison in it at all; but it has no flavor, and people will not drink it. You may reduce it to the necessary strength by the addition of distilled water and it is a pure, colorless fluid like clear water. It has no color at all; it has no taste; it simply burns you and intoxicates; that is all; and people do not want to drink, at least those I have seen have never been willing to drink, for that purpose alone.

The added ingredient referred to in the bill I take to mean coloring matter, which is put in the water-white alcohol to give it color and also to give it smoothness, or make it a little less biting on the throat.

Mr. HALE. What is put in it?

Mr. TILLMAN. Well, they use burnt caramel, various dyestuffs, and one thing and another to give color to it. They also use what is known as "beading oil." I do not know exactly what it is. It is a chemical. I got a sample of it and carried it home to South Carolina for our chemist to try to investigate.

Mr. HALE. Is it pernicious?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is poisonous, of course. Beading oil is added to the alcohol to make the bubbles come. If you take pure alcohol and pour it out from one glass into another it simply drops down to the level without a solitary bubble on it; but if you take pure whisky and pour it out, there is always a nice bead there. The fellow who wants to get rich selling cheap alcohol for fine whisky will put this beading oil in the poorest form of alcohol, and he will put burnt caramel in it, and will make gin, rum, brandy, or whisky, and sell it in the market.

Pure alcohol, as I said, is the basis of fine blended whisky, and the other things added to this alcohol are the old pure whiskies that have never been carried above 60 per cent in their distillation, and water added. They are put in Government warehouses as whisky and left there in charge of the Government to age.

Of course men take it out and carry it to their own stores or cellars and warehouses, but so long as the stuff stays in the wood it will change very little, and no chemical reactions will change the contents of the barrel. But as soon as you put it in glass and seal it and the atmosphere is excluded, there is said to be no change whatever, and whisky that is bottled before it has aged in wood is considered by those who are experts never to get any better, whereas if it is left in the barrel it improves up to six or seven years, and then they say there is doubt whether it gets any better or not. There is very little of it that old, unless you find some man who buys it and lays it away with the idea of tickling the imagination of some one by saying, "It is thirty or forty or fifty years of age," and so on.

There is another strange peculiarity about whisky. You may put it in a barrel and seal it hermetically. It will go there, say, at 100 proof, which is the full Government standard—that is, one-half alcohol and one-half water—the difference being that whisky is regarded as proof when it is one-half or 50 per cent, and alcohol is only pure when it is 95 per cent—that is, full strength.

You take a fine alcohol and pour it into a vat and add some two-stamp whisky, as it is known, or straight whisky, that has come out of the Government warehouse and been aged by natural process, with its aroma and flavor increasing every year. As I say, you add a certain percentage of this two-stamp whisky to your pure alcohol, and by adding some coloring matter and some sugar in the way of burnt caramel, you get what are known as the finé blended whiskies of commerce, selling for five or six dollars a gallon. But they all have at the bottom the deodorized alcohol, which is worth $1.27 a gallon, I believe. To take out the word "added" would simply destroy the opportunity of punishing the adulterator for adding coloring matter and sweetening matter and bead oil to the product in order to bamboozle his customers.

I do not care to trespass longer on the time of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. MONEY. There is plenty of time.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. MONEY. For what purpose?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I desire to offer an amendment to the bill.

Mr. MONEY. I yield.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I submit an amendment to the pending bill, which I ask to have printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, there is no doubt that there is a general demand everywhere for some reform in the manufacture and preparation of food, drinks, drugs, etc. There is no doubt that a great many frauds are practiced which not only enrich very hastily the people who are guilty of such practices, but rob the people of health and strength. And therefore, I assume, there is not a Senator here who does not sincerely desire that there should be a pure-food bill of some sort. The trouble mainly has been, however, that pure-food bills have been brought in to serve some special purpose rather than to effect any general reform, and it is also true that some of the ablest Senators in this body have been unable to accept the pure-food bills which have been offered, because they authorized the General Government in some measure to infringe upon the police powers of the several States.

This is a consideration which I know has operated in my own mind frequently, because these bills formerly went to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, of which I have the honor to be a member, and I know, also, that others were troubled by it exceedingly and could not reconcile themselves to the passage of measures which would seem to encroach or give room for any sort of encroachment upon the police powers of the States.

The police power of the State or of any municipality, of any organized or unorganized society, is one of those inherent and inalienable powers that is necessary for the preservation of society itself. Therefore, it is very wise, indeed, that Senators should be careful in considering propositions that may tend in any manner to give a color to any pretension on the part of the Federal Government to encroach upon the powers of the States.

I have never before, in a long legislative experience, had the courtesy extended to me of a gentleman offering to launch me into the discussion—in other words, be a sort of curtain raiser to my speech; and I must thank the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] for his kind and thoughtful consideration in taking the floor for the purpose of making a few anticipatory remarks in order that I might be fairly put into the discussion.

I also, I suppose, should thank the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER], who said the other day that he did not impute any improper motive to me in offering this bill providing for pure drugs, drinks, and food. I had that read to me. I did not see in what kind of connection that voluntary indorsement of honesty could have been introduced. I do not suppose the Senator intended to impute any improper motives to me about this matter, because he could not do it in justice to himself.

But I will say, in order to return the courtesy, that I do not believe the Senator from North Dakota, who introduced a similar bill in a previous Congress, or the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], who introduced the bill in the present Congress—prepared, I believe, by somebody in the Department of Agriculture—had any improper motive whatever, nor do I impugn their motives in any way.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should not like the Senator to be under the impression that this bill was prepared by the Department of Agriculture. Neither the Department of Agriculture nor any official connected with it ever saw it until after it was introduced in this body, nor was it ever submitted to them.

Mr. MONEY. Very likely. I accept, of course, the Senator's statement; but as a general thing the Departments do prepare these bills; and I must say that if this bill has gone through that Department, it would have been a little better than it is as prepared by the Senator from Idaho.

The substitute which I introduced here is one that was prepared by the secretary of the National Food Manufacturers' Association. It was prepared with great care, and was submitted to a very eminent lawyer, a distinguished ex-Senator, as to its constitutional character. I then went over it with regard particularly to that part of it, and took particular care that there should not be a solitary line anywhere or any word that could be construed as an encroachment upon the police powers of the several States; and those who do themselves the justice, before the vote, to examine this amendment by way of a substitute, will see that this is true.

The bill has been indorsed by nearly all of the trade and commercial papers of the United States, and has met with the approval and indorsement of almost the entire food and drug industry of the United States, so far as they have read the same and expressed any opinion.

The association that has adopted and indorsed the same is composed of about 300 food manufacturers, among them being some of the leading and best known firms in the United States. The codfish industry of the Atlantic coast as well as the codfish industry of the Pacific coast want this bill; California canners and preservers and dried-fruit packers want this bill; the leading manufacturers of catsups, jellies, jams, and preserves, sweet pickles, and every other food product in which a preservative must, as a necessity, be used want this bill. The bill is acceptable to and is asked for by the reputable and honest manufacturers of foods and drugs, who want a food law that will prohibit the adulteration of foods. The association indorsing the bill represents about 22 of the leading food industries, and the members of the association are scattered from Maine to California.

I will say that most of these have expressed their disapproval of the Heyburn bill, so called, and the various canning associations, which met last week at Atlantic City, declined to indorse a resolution favoring the Heyburn bill.

I will state further that the National Live Stock Association passed a resolution at their late meeting, only two weeks ago, in which they condemn the Heyburn bill and ask in the interest of their industry that something else shall be passed instead. I will ask the Secretary to read their resolution, as they are an important association, involving a great deal of money and a large number of people, and as they are producers of the raw material, it can not be said that they have conspired against the health and comfort of the consumers of the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolution adopted by American National Live Stock Association at its annual meeting held in Denver, Colo., January 30, 31, and February 1, 1906.

While fully in sympathy with the passage of a national pure-food law explicit as to terms, definitions, and standards, and properly safeguarding the interests of the live-stock industry, it is our belief that certain bills now pending in Congress, known as "House bill 4527" and "Senate bill 88," are indefinite in terms and vague, and no standard of purity is fixed; and, not only the administration of the pure-food law, but the creation of standards and definitions, is left to the Bureau of Chemistry, thus practically delegating legislative powers to that Bureau; and inasmuch as these bills have not been, nor can they be, discussed in proportion to their importance at this session of Congress: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the American National Live Stock Association, in annual convention assembled at Denver, February 1, 1906, is opposed to the passage of these laws in their present form, and we therefore direct the executive committee of this association to carefully investigate the provisions of said bills and to make protest against any part thereof which is injurious to the live stock and meat producing interests of this country.

Mr. McCUMBER. I regret to state that I did not listen to the reading of the entire paper. Is that from the beef trust?

Mr. MONEY. It is from the National Live Stock Association.

Mr. McCUMBER. Is that a part of the beef trust?

Mr. MONEY. I do not know whether it is or not. The members raise horses and cattle and some other things. They may be a part of the beef trust. I do not know.

Mr. WARREN rose.

Mr. MONEY. The Senator from Wyoming is competent to speak on this subject, and I yield to him.

Mr. WARREN. If the communication is from the National Live Stock Association, and I assume it is——

Mr. MONEY. It is.

Mr. WARREN. They are diametrically the opposite of the beef trust. In other words, if there are any victims of the beef trust, they are the victims.

Mr. MONEY. I so understood, but I preferred that a gentleman who is a distinguished member of the association, and a great horse and cattle raiser, should answer the question, as he could do it with much better authority and more knowledge.

One objection which the Senator from Idaho presented to me in the outset of his remarks was that I did not include the word "manufacturer" in this bill. The bill reads this way:

That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to ship or transport, or deliver for shipment or transportation, from any State or Territory, the District of Columbia, etc.

It follows the language of the Senator's bill. If that does not include the manufacturer, then there is nothing comprehensive enough in the English language to do so. Who is it that delivers and ships but the manufacturer? But as all these bills can relate only to what are called by the court "original packages"—whole packages—in order to bring it within the power of Congress to regulate commerce between the States, every person who offers it for shipment, or delivers it for shipment or transportation to another, comes within the inhibition of this provision. If that does not include the manufacturer, then the words do not mean anything at all, and they do not mean anybody.

The substitute preserves somewhat, I think, the right of the people who are engaged in honest manufacturing, and I do not suppose anybody ever will stand up for a minute and support any manufacturer using an adulterant, much less a poison.

The Senator says only the chemical combination creates poisons; that nature never provided any poison. That is so entirely at variance with all the information I have on the subject (and I am quite familiar with a great number of the most deadly poisons that nature has provided without the aid of man or chemistry) that I do not see how the statement could have been made. If the Senator meant it to apply simply to food, that is another question, because no man ever selected as a food a product of nature that was a poison.

There are a great many men in this country engaged in adulterating food and drink and drugs who ought to be, whether there is a law for it or not, hanged by the neck. They are the people who, for the sake of a few dirty dollars, are willing to imperil the comfort, the health, and the lives of millions of people who can not protect themselves.

I had a man, a small grocer in a very small town in Mississippi, approach me, who told me that he had received a circular from a concern—in the State of Illinois, if I am not mistaken—that proposed to sell him terra alba, or white earth, ground into an impalpable powder, not to be distinguished by appearance from flour, and notified him that he could get it at $6 a ton, for the purpose of adulterating flour, and saying that he could not afford to do without it, because all his competitors were using it.

There are a lot of men, whether they are the operators or the stockholders, who are wholesale assassins, breaking the very staff of life unto the helpless and weak, putting a stone in the mouths of those who call for bread, subjecting the feeble and infirm, the young and the aged, who need nourishment more than they do medicine, to the task of endeavoring to live a little longer on dirt—white dirt.

That is a matter which the States have undertaken to deal with generally, and what we want here is a national law that will protect the limited districts and the limited number of people who are directly under the jurisdiction of the National Government, and at the same time to afford a law so reasonable in its requirements, so efficient in its action upon these adulterators of foods and drugs and medicines, that it will not only stop the practice, so far as we can do it by regulating interstate commerce, but also so just a law that the States themselves will modify theirs, so as to have a very effective uniformity prevail throughout the United States.

There is another thing that I object to in the Heyburn bill, and that is the fact, without mentioning names at all, that a certain official, who may die to-morrow and his place be taken by another man—the present occupant of the office is a man of great ability and fine character, to whom I have no objection, but something of admiration—is made the sole arbiter of the manufacturing interests of the United States, so far as food products, drinks, and drugs are concerned. He has his aids, who are appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture. They are called agricultural chemists. They may be analytical chemists, but I do not know whether any of them are hygienic chemists.

They hold their meetings in cities convenient for trade, and anybody, I understand, can appear before them and make what defense he pleases of his preparation, but they have no record of their meetings; they have no stenographer; nothing is ever preserved. They pay more or less attention—I do not know how much—to these statements made before them. They then proceed with their work. This official—not naming him now or hereafter—under the Heyburn bill, has the power to compel the brand of "fraud" or "adulterated" to be imposed upon any sort of package of food or drink or medicine, and that immediately paralyzes that trade.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply want to say that while the Senator's statement is correct, it is based upon a clerical error in the forming of the bill. That provision was intended to apply only after conviction in the courts, and it is the intention of the chairman of the committee to modify it accordingly.

Mr. HEYBURN. The amendment has already been suggested.

Mr. MONEY. I am glad to know it; and I want to say that almost any change would be an improvement.

Mr. HEYBURN. "After final judgment."

Mr. MONEY. Let us see what that means. "After final judgment" of whom?

Mr. HEYBURN. Of the courts.

Mr. MONEY. Of the courts. Do I understand the Senator to say that he has accepted an amendment to his bill that the courts can first inquire into these penal offenses?

Mr. HEYBURN. Section 4 of the bill contains the provision to which the Senator is addressing his remarks, and it provides that the Bureau of Chemistry shall ascertain facts and report them to the Department of Agriculture. They determine nothing except facts. The Secretary of Agriculture determines nothing. He reports the facts to the United States district attorney for the district in which the offense arises. The United States attorney then is authorized to commence suit in the United States court under the provisions of the proposed law. Until the court renders its final judgment the notice would not be given as to the stamp of fraud upon the goods.

Mr. MONEY. That is exactly what is provided for in my substitute, except that the Secretary of Commerce and Labor has the power to do it instead of the Secretary of Agriculture. I am very glad the introduction of my substitute has had some effect in that direction, for it is almost the language of my substitute, except it is not the Secretary of Agriculture, but the Secretary of Commerce and Labor who is to have charge of this matter under my substitute.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to suggest to the Senator that this bill, of course, provides also for a hearing of the parties. When it is found that the goods which have been obtained from them are subject to the provisions of this bill or are adulterated or impure, they are given notice, and they are afforded an opportunity to be heard, and that constitutes the findings of fact. That hearing supplies the facts which are found and reported as a basis for action, and unless they are found——

Mr. MONEY. I am very glad to know there has been that much improvement.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is not a change in the bill. Section 4 of the bill as originally reported contains that provision. The only proposed change is the insertion of the words that were originally intended to be in the bill and through some mistake in transcribing were dropped out—"after final judgment."

Mr. KEAN. What line is that?

Mr. MONEY. Bills of this character, as I remarked a while ago, have been going to the Committee on Agriculture. Since this new Department was organized they have gone to the Committee on Manufactures, operating in connection with that Department. There is no necessity that I can see why this bill should go to the Committee on Manufactures unless the whole subject is transferred to that Department. I know that the way this matter has been conducted heretofore has been that the chemist of the Agriculture Department, in conjunction with those appointed by the Secretary to assist him, have never made, as far as I could ever learn, any quantitative analysis of foods, drinks, or medicines or anything else. They have made a qualitative analysis, and under that a great many evils have been done and great losses have been incurred by manufacturers who were perfectly honest in the preparation of their food products.

For instance, in undertaking to analyze a food product, the chemist desires naturally to find whether there is anything whatever of a trace of certain articles usually used in the preparation of food products and in their preservation—not so much in their preparation as in their preservation—boracic acid, salicylic acid, sulphurous acid—not sulphuric acid—and a large number of others which have been used simply in the quantity necessary to preserve, but not in a quantity generally that would injure anybody. Whenever it is used in that quantity it becomes the province of the chemist to determine it, but no such attempt has been made up to this time by the Chemist of the Agriculture Department, so far as I have learned—that is, by quantitative analysis to find out what was the proportion of the preserving article to the whole product.

For instance, you can not, so I am informed, put up meat, especially sausages and articles of that kind, without a small trace of boracic acid; and my substitute fixes the quantity beyond which they can not go without incurring the penalties of the law, which are fine and imprisonment. It permits them to use a very small percentage of preservative to the whole product, a percentage of which can do no harm to anybody taken in the quantity that is used for the preservation.

Now, a case in point happened where a carload of sausages went to Pennsylvania from Chicago. An analysis was made, and it was found that there was a trace of boracic acid. The Pennsylvania authorities said, "Boracic acid is a poison." Therefore it was stamped "poison," and that carload was sent back to the shipper at his expense. Profiting by that experience, a rival in business sent a carload of sausages not preserved by boracic acid or anything else and it was rejected because it contained ptomaine poison. Ptomaine, you know, is an alkaloid—it is a cadavaric alkaloid. It is a product of the decomposition of meat and also in one sense of particles of the structure of the human frame. So the one carload was condemned for containing boracic acid (and if a man had eaten the whole carload of sausage the boracic acid would not have hurt him) and the other carload was rejected because the manufacturer could not preserve his meat without subjecting him to the penalty of the Pennsylvania law and his meat was condemned because it contained ptomaine. Here is the injury inflicted, with no attempt, however, to determine how much could be taken with impunity or with safety.

My bill proposes to limit the amount. I say "my bill;" I introduced it at the request of these gentlemen. Here is a proportion, a percentage, that can be used of certain preservatives, and the best chemists in the world say that they are not injurious:

There is also a method by which it can be decided whether or not the manufacturer or producer or deliverer of these goods has done anything which would be deleterious to the general health. In the first place, the officers of the law will take three samples, which he is authorized to purchase. In that matter it follows the laws of pretty nearly every State in the Union, as well as those of Great Britain. Massachusetts and other States have such a law. Three samples shall be taken, one of which shall be analyzed by the chemist, not an agricultural chemist, but a hygienic chemist, the chemist in the division of chemistry of the hygienic laboratory of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, whose business it is to analyze things concerning health and life, and not an agricultural chemist merely, nor an analytical chemist merely. Before any action can be taken against a man the analysis must be shown him. He is permitted then by his own chemist to make an analysis, and then he can go to the court and appeal, and there he has his hearing; and the third package is there for analysis, if it is deemed necessary by the court, the reports being submitted from the two other chemists—the Government chemist and the chemist of the manufacturer or the preparer of these foods. So there is no danger of a man's business being broken up before he has had a hearing, as there was under the original bill, which I am glad to see has been amended in that particular.

It is not necessary to go into any general statement about the desirability of something being done. The only thing is to do it so as to protect the rights of everybody. Heretofore there has been an indifference manifested as to proprietary drugs, medicines, food products, etc.

There is another thing in the bill that I have offered as a substitute. Whenever there is a well-known article of food which has been used we admit it as a lawful component part of a preparation under its trade-mark or name. I have in mind right now Lea & Perrin's Worcestershire sauce, which has a world-wide use and reputation, and has had for a hundred years or more. That, under some ruling of your commission, whatever it may be in future, has been rejected, because the ingredients were not printed in their proportion upon the labels, or something of that sort. Some of the States require these to be printed; some do not. Some require that in the preparation of jelly the word "jelly" must be used; others do not. So what is good in one State is bad in another. A manufacturer sending his goods from one State to another without knowing what States they are going to or what sort of a label is to be put on, finds that what is perfectly acceptable to one State will be objectionable to the next State.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. The Senator was speaking about having a formula for the use of boracic acid in the preservation of meats. I understand his bill provides for a certain percentage.

Mr. MONEY. Yes; no formula, but simply a percentage.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to hear from the Senator on that point, as to how that is superior to the bill under consideration. As I understand the pending bill, it does not prohibit the use of boracic acid in the preservation of meats, but leaves it for the court to determine on complaint as to whether a larger quantity than is healthful to be used is used or not.

Mr. MONEY. That, as I understand, is the amendment which has been offered. It was not in the original bill, and I have been addressing myself to that.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not understand the Senator. The original bill simply provides that a person may use anything. He may use strychnine, if he wants, as a preservative; but the courts must determine whether or not the quantity that is used is injurious to health; nothing more and nothing less. That has been in the bill which I reported time and again, and it has not been changed. It is in the bill pending to-day.

Mr. HOPKINS. With that explanation I should like to hear from the Senator from Mississippi on the point as to whether the formula provided by him is better than the bill as presented by the committee.

Mr. MONEY. There is no formula provided. It is simply a per centum. That would be determined by the best chemists who have been engaged in the chemical work of these great manufactories.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will allow me——

Mr. HOPKINS. Is it not better not to have that in the bill at all, because under the present bill, as I understand from the reading of it, and as explained by the Senator from North Dakota, that amount of boracic acid can be used without subjecting the user of it to the penalties provided in the bill?

Mr. MONEY. Well, the advantage of mine is that the manufacturer knows exactly what to put in and is not subject to any inquiry by the courts.

Mr. HOPKINS. But the trouble with that, to my mind, is that if it should be found that a fraction over that amount is used, then the person becomes liable to the fines and penalties of the bill.

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. It might be that upon chemical analysis the proportion that was used might not be deleterious to health, and under the present bill it would not subject the user to the penalties of the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. Then, if the Senator will pardon me——

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Will we not have different standards applied in different parts of the country——

Mr. MONEY. Of course.

Mr. SPOONER. Whenever the Federal courts happen to become involved in a trial of the question?

Mr. HOPKINS. I wish to ask the Senator if we have experienced chemists who will be called upon on trial to determine it, and they say that it is not deleterious to health, is that any objection?

Mr. MONEY. I will answer the Senator by saying these cases may be tried in any number of courts and testimony may be given by any number of chemists. According to my opinion, the manufacturer has his chemical analysis and the Department can have the analysis of the Division of Hygienic Chemistry here, the Bureau of Quarantine and Public Health, and then the court can have an analysis if necessary. But here is a standard fixed, and the manufacturer knows that if he goes beyond a limit he has made himself liable to investigation and to the branding of his goods in a way which will destroy his trade. He does not have to wait until he goes before a court under arrest charged with a penal offense and subject to fine and imprisonment; but when he is preparing his goods he knows that if he puts in more than one-tenth per cent of one or one-half per cent of another, and so on, that very fact has carried him beyond the true line and he is subject to these penalties.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Then, as I understand the Senator, he would have Congress fix the standard. The committee thought it best not to allow even the Secretary of Agriculture or his corps of chemists to fix the standard.

Mr. MONEY. I think myself it is better that they should not.

Mr. McCUMBER. They did not think it safe for any man or set of men to fix a standard, and therefore they have eliminated any provision that would indicate that any person might fix a standard. Under the bill as it is now reported there is no standard except the standard the court and jury shall determine. Suppose the court and jury should determine that twice the amount of boracic acid would not be injurious, ought the person then to be convicted for using it, even though it was greater than the amount that is stated in the Senator's amendment? I do not believe there is a Senator here who knows what should be a standard, but we can all agree that the courts shall determine with a jury what is injurious to health when used in large quantities.

Right here, if the Senator will allow me, I would refer to the statement made by the Senator from Wisconsin. We do not propose to say what percentage of alcohol there shall be in beer, for instance, to determine its intoxicating qualities, and yet in every State——

Mr. MONEY. You would be wise if you did.

Mr. McCUMBER. In every State which has a prohibition law or in every county where it may not be prohibited in the whole State, the question is submitted to the court and the jury whether or not the particular ingredient which was sold was inoxicating or whether it was not. Of course each jury might find a different standard. That is true in almost every matter under the criminal law where it is not fixed absolutely by the statute itself. It would be impossible for us, it seems to me, who know nothing about these chemicals, to fix a standard; it would be even worse than giving it to the Secretary of Agriculture.

Mr. MONEY. Of course I listen with pleasure always to the deliberate judgment of the Senator, but I do not understand yet how a jury is any more competent to tell how much boracic acid or sulphuric acid or any other acid shall go into a compesition for the public use than Congress is, with its unlimited means of getting information.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will answer the Senator.

Mr. MONEY. One moment. At last the jury must depend upon the chemist; the court must depend upon the chemist; and the provision makes three chemists testify as to the quality of the goods, whatever it may be. By chemical processes it has been definitely ascertained that the amounts named in the substitute bill, or they would never have been named in it, were not injurious to health, but preservative of the food that was offered to the public.

It is a fact that it is the qualitative analysis that has governed the practice of the Department up to this date. We know that in one of the States, and I believe, if I am not mistaken in the State of the Senator who is the sponsor of this bill, the commissioner there declared that canned fruit from California had a trace of boracic acid and he condemned it. The firm that packed the goods declared that they never had put boracic acid in it, and his reply was that he did not care whether they had put it or whether God Almighty had put it in, it had boracic acid in it, and boracic acid was a poison, and he did not want it, and therefore he condemned the whole business.

As a matter of fact, it is pretty well known, I believe, to everybody that when you get away beyond the Mississippi River in what is called the "alkali country," and to the Pacific coast, all the fruit, notably apples, have a large trace of boracic acid; and in the preparation of apples, in the main, as in making jellies or anything of that sort, one may always find a trace of boracic acid. There was a lot of goods absolutely pure and free, with not enough boracic acid to hurt anything, just what nature itself had placed there and, according to the Senator from Idaho, nature never put anything in the wrong place, and yet they were condemned.

Now, it is intended to avoid these things and to enable the manufacturer plainly to see his duty, not to violate the law, and at the same time to put in a sufficient quantity of these condemned substances, as they ought to be, to preserve his meats.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator a question right there?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator's opening statement was that his bill would not interfere with the police power of the State.

Mr. MONEY. I say that yet.

Mr. McCUMBER. He said it was carefully guarded for that purpose. Now, as a matter of fact, unless my ability of construction is entirely wanting, that is exactly what it does do and what the Senator's argument leads to. Take the action of the State chemist of the State of North Dakota. North Dakota may have a law that no goods containinig boracic acid shall be sold in that State. Now, the Senator's bill is aimed against that law, and provides that if it has not to exceed one-half of 1 per cent it may be sold in that State. The effect of such a law is directly in opposition and infringes upon the laws of the State itself.

There is scarcely a State in the Union that has not got a positive law against the use of any one of the preservatives that are mentioned here. It is clear to me that the object of the Senator's bill is to override those State laws which prohibit the use of those articles and to allow them to go in.

I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that there are nearly seven pages out of the whole number of pages of his amendment directed simply to the matter how you may obtain samples, and it so guards the use of the samples that no one on earth could ever get into court with one of those samples. You apply a new rule for the courts in the trial and determination of the matter.

The Senator finds fault with any standard that a jury may fix. The jury will have the chemist before them. The chemist will be before the court. The chemist will examine those particular articles. The chemist can be cross-examined before a court, which he can not be before a Department. So it throws every possible safeguard around the man who is accused, and he must be convicted by evidence that will establish his guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Now, I can not imagine how he could be more safely guarded than by a provision of that character.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, the Senator floated off on the tide of his own talk and got away from his original proposition entirely, which was that according to his interpretation of the Constitution this infringes upon the State law, and then he adduced the instances. It is perfectly clear to my mind that it does not, just as clear as obviously the contrary is clear to the very clear mind, I will say, of the Senator from North Dakota. This applies only to shippers in original packages. The tag or label or brand is plain; it is easily discerned; it is fixed to each one of them; and under the interstate-commerce law and under the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States that original unbroken package, perfectly within the control of Congress and the National Government, can go anywhere where the Constitution prevails. When it gets into the State, if it is contrary to the State law, then when that package is broken the State authorities seize upon the contents of that original package broken, and then they punish the men who infringe the State law. If they can follow the tag back to the shipper or the deliverer of the original package and show that he has violated the national law, for instance, taking either one of these bills, then it goes to the court and he is punished.

I want to say to the Senator, what he seems to have overlooked, that here comes in the chemist, whose business it is to consider questions affecting life and health—the chemist of the division of hygiene in this bureau of public health. He is the officer to whom it comes first. Then a package goes to the manufacturer and he can employ his chemist. Both these analyses can be produced before the jury; and in addition a third package, according to my bill, is reserved for the court chemist—anyone who may be selected by the court—so the three can be compared, and the jury will have the benefit of all that.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. I wish to suggest to the Senator that a serious objection to the fourth provision, on page 13 of his bill, is that it fixes a standard that is not in accord with the standard in most of the States. Most of the States would not permit the sale of articles containing the percentages mentioned in that fourth paragraph. It would result in the Government permitting a manufacturer to ship into the State goods that would be contraband under the State law. That is not fair to the State. It is the object of the pending bill to aid the States in the enforcement of pure-food laws. It should be elastic enough in its provisions to conform always to the limitations of the State law. If you were to undertake to ship into our State goods containing the percentages named in that fourth paragraph, they would be contraband when they arrived in the State and the packages were broken. Now, it defeats the purpose of national legislation to do that kind of thing, does it not?

Mr. MONEY. The Senator did not do me the honor to listen to what I had to say in the beginning or he has easily forgotten. I said that one of the principal objects was to make so reasonable a bill that the State would conform to it as near as possible, and we would have a uniform system of pure-food laws throughout the United States, the States getting together around the national legislation as a sort of nucleus, or being supplemental to it, for convenience of local administration and having the right of local administration. There is not anybody here or elsewhere who would stand up more stoutly and more persistently for the right of every State to regulate its police matters than I. That is my disposition. I am antagonizing all the time every effort to centralize this Government and endeavoring to retain within the several States all that power which was reserved to them in the ninth and tenth amendments of the Constitution.

Mr. HEYBURN. But I would suggest to the Senator that nearly all the States have pure-food laws.

Mr. MONEY. I understand that. The Senator must not infer that I am entirely ignorant. This is no kindergarten, but the United States Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. My suggestions were based upon that condition of facts; I am not attempting to criticise the Senator or to impeach his knowledge.

Mr. MONEY. As I remarked before, the Senator's State, under his own State law, rejected apples coming from California, because they had boracic acid and because boracic acid is poison, and the law says anything poisonous shall be stamped "poison." The reply to the sworn statement that there was nothing in it whatever was that he did not care whether the manufacturer or God Almighty put boracic acid in it, it could not go there. The object is to correct just such legislation as that, not by the power of Congress, because we have none, but by the persuasive power of national legislation in protecting the public health and at the same time giving an opportunity to the manufacturer of those products to eliminate anything hurtful and harmful, and to punish those who willfully transgress, so far as the Federal arm can reach them, and haul them to court and, with the proper processes, confronting them with witnesses and having the three chemists to examine into the preparation and determine its character.

Now, then, the original package must be labeled or branded or tagged so that it can be traced. It must be legible and discernible when it comes into the State, then it is broken and the State law comes in, as it should. Both Senators know very well that all the time original packages are being sent into States that have absolute prohibition of the sale. What about your liquor law and original packages going into a prohibition State? Can you stop them from going in? Yet with the perfect right in your police power, regulating health and morals, you can say, "You shall not distribute and sell, because then you come under the provision of our law."

Now, I respect the sentiments of the prohibition States, although I want to say I do not think a general prohibition law ever effects its object. We have in my State what I consider a great deal better, and that is the local-option law, enabling each county to determine for itself what it will sell and drink and use. And I want to say that out of seventy-six counties in the State only nine of them sell any kind of spirits. All the others are called "dry" counties. In all my experience as a voter I have never yet voted a "wet" ticket. I have never signed in my life a license or a petition for a license for a grocery or a saloon, and I have set the example of being a temperance man. I am not temperate, though, because I have determined to be temperate and have sworn somewhere to be temperate and wear a blue ribbon, but because I simply have enough control of myself without any such assistance as is associated with ribbons and buttons to keep myself from being a brute. In the first place, I do not care anything about any of those things, never having learned the use, and if I had I have enough confidence in my own self-control and resolution to know that I could quit any habit I might have contracted. As far as that is concerned, I do not know that I have a habit in the world, good or bad. I act every day just as I please, and I generally please to do that which I think is right, and I take the consequences. I have never charged the devil yet with any of my sins. I have not done anything because he has tempted me, but because I wanted to do it myself.

Now, the agency for the application of this law is, I think, properly in the Department of Commerce and Labor. It comes distinctively under that Department. The only thing we are concerned with particularly is the transportation question. We are doing all that we are doing to-day in any proposition that has been made here by way of bill, substitute, or amendment, because we have the power under that clause of the Constitution which enables us to regulate commerce with foreign countries, among the States, and with the several Indian tribes. That is the narrow ground on which we stand. Here is a Department specially organized to take care of commerce and transportation and manufactures. That is the proper Department to put in force these laws, whatever they may be, as we consider them and pass them. The Secretary of Agriculture is a man whom I have known for thirty years, a very honorable, industrious, and indefatigable worker. He is the best Secretary I have ever known there, I think, and there is no doubt but what he would want to do his duty.

But the Secretary can be deceived as well as anybody else. He has the particular line of work which is the duty engaging all of his attention. I can not understand why the Department of Agriculture, devoted to the product, the raw stuff, and nothing else, should be invested with the authority and power to administer laws which relate to the transportation of manufactures. I do not see the harmony of the thing. It is incongruous. It does not belong to that Department, and why should it be insisted on that the Secretary of Agriculture shall discharge those duties?

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. Take the subject of meats. Under laws that exist at the present time meats are inspected by agents of that Department.

Mr. MONEY. I know that.

Mr. HOPKINS. Would it not be more in harmony to have these chemical inspections proceed also from the same Department? All of our food products that go abroad must have the stamp of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. MONEY. I understand that that is true as to the raw product; but we are dealing now with articles in transportation, not with the raw product. The bill does not propose to cover the raising of cattle. It has no reference whatever, if the Senator will pardon me, to the meat product, but to meat on the car, and that is where we get in—on the transportation of the meat product from one place to another.

The States themselves have legislated very well to a certain extent on this subject. I have a list of such States here, and I have the State laws also. I had them copied, and I could read them if I had the eyesight, which I have not, but I shall ask consent to put them into the RECORD that they may be there for the information of Senators who have not taken the trouble to look into this matter for themselves.

Mr. ALLISON. I suggest to the Senator to ask permission to insert them all.

Mr. MONEY. I shall ask to put into the RECORD such matter as I consider of value toward the explanation of this subject.

The Secretary of Agriculture, as I have said, is a very useful and efficient administrative officer. I believe he will always do his level best; and yet we see his inability as we should see the inability of any other Secretary to cover his whole Department. He has a vast one. He has eight or ten laboratories; he has a great corps of scientific men who are working for the wages of day laborers, and less, simply in the cause of science—graduates of scientific institutions—some of them working for as low as $40 a month, men who have graduated from American and also from European universities, speaking half a dozen languages, and yet working for from $40 to $50 a month in the cause of science. In spite of the spirit of commercialism to-day and the great desire of people to accumulate, there are quite a number of people who pursue an intellectual pursuit, not for gain, but simply for the satisfaction which it gives them to make discoveries for the use of mankind.

That sentiment is prevalent around the German universities, where any man who has studied to become a lecturer on a certain topic or a certain science or a certain subject and who has become familiar with it, works for a very small salary, which would be contemptible in this country, devoting his entire intellectual research and knowledge to the elucidation of that question of science, philosophy, or whatever it may be. If one of that number should leave that circle to engage in any business and devote his great talents to mere money making he would incur the sneers of his former companions. We have also such people over here, but notwithstanding this the Secretary has great difficulty. His duties are every day extended as we increase and diversify our agricultural industries, particularly in stock raising.

I have the honor of being a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, to which these bills uniformly came until the last two Congresses, and I know something of what the Agriculture Department does. I know something of the requirements and duties in that Department, and I know we are always overloading it. The Department of Commerce and Labor was established for the purpose of unloading several of the other Departments of the Government. We take a bureau from one Department and a bureau from another and a division from another, and we are getting under the Department of Commerce and Labor those things which legitimately belong to that Department, and here is one of the things which, as much as any other thing, belongs there, because it is a matter of transportation alone, which brings it within Federal control and gives us jurisdiction because it is the product of labor, manufacturing labor generally. "Manufacturing labor" I say in general terms. The word "manufacture," of course, as literally construed, means made by hand, but it has now come to mean made by machinery. At any rate, this is a business that legitimately comes under the consideration of that Department and is included in these bills and these amendments. It is impossible for me to think that the Department of Agriculture can conduct this business as satisfactorily as can the Department of Commerce and Labor for the reason I have just stated.

In the amendment that I had the honor to produce here every provision is made to guard the rights of the States, which are not to be infringed and can not be under the amendment. I asked a gentleman to indicate to me where this interferes with State rights. A distinguished lawyer and an ex-Senator went over it very carefully as to the constitutional question before I overlooked it myself, and he was satisfied that it did not.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. MONEY. Yes; I will hear the gentleman.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thought the Senator said—I did not understand him thoroughly—that he saw nothing in the amendment which he introduced here that would interfere with the rights of the States. Am I correct about that?

Mr. MONEY. Yes; that is what I said.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I call the Senator's attention right here to page 3 and read a little portion of it?

Mr. MONEY. Yes; read it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Commencing with line 6 on page 3, I find the following:

> And no person, firm, or corporation shall be convicted under the provisions of this act for having received in any State or Territory, the District of Columbia, or insular possessions, from any other State or Territory, the District of Columbia, insular possession, or from a foreign country, and delivered in original unbroken packages—

I call attention to that portion—> original unbroken packages, for pay or otherwise, any article of food or drugs adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, if said article is labeled, branded, or tagged in manner and form as required aforesaid—

That provides that they shall all be tagged, showing the name of the manufacturer—> at the time of so receiving and delivering said article.

Then follows:

> Provided, That any person, firm, or corporation who shall receive in any State or Territory, the District of Columbia, or insular possession, from any other State or Territory, the District of Columbia, insular possession, or from a foreign country, any article of food or drugs not labeled, branded, or tagged, in the manner and form as required herein, shall label, brand, or tag said article with their correct name and address, before delivering the same, for pay or otherwise, in the original unbroken package,

It seems to me that the real meaning of that section is that as to the person receiving, even if the State provides, as it may provide, against the sale of adulterated or misbranded articles in original packages if they are a fraud—and adulteration and misbranding is a fraud—or if they are poisonous, and therefore not commercial, it may strike the goods in the original unbroken packages, with those two exceptions.

Under the provisions of this amendment, if the retailer will put the wholesaler's name on the article he shall not be punished, no matter what the State laws may be. I can get no other construction out of that section; and if I am in error, the Senator I know, of course, will be pleased to correct me.

Mr. MONEY. Yes; I think the Senator is in error. He started out with one idea and got onto another. He started out with the idea that I was infringing upon the rights of the States and then he undertook to show that it was an infringement upon the rights of the Government.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; the State may punish while the article is in the original package; but this amendment provides that the State shall not punish—that no punishment shall be had—if the article is in original unbroken packages, though it be a fraud and though it be absolutely poisonous. I do not understand the construction of the interstate-commerce law as to original packages to mean that you can ship anything else but what is known as a "commercial article;" and that is not a commercial article which is a fraud, such as adulterating or misbranding or which is not commercial by reason of its putrescence or other reasons. The State can reach them there in the original unbroken packages; but no matter how great the fraud, under this amendment the State can not touch the article while in the original package.

Mr. MONEY. The State can not touch the article in the original package, it is true, but it can touch it whenever that package is broken; and it can not be used by the citizens until the package is broken. That is where the State steps in, when it comes to its sale and distribution. Now, I have to say to the Senator, while this matter is up, that I have endeavored in my amendment to protect the retail dealer in the State, who has been the object of a great many objurgations in connection with the sale of adulterated foods, by leaving him out entirely, because we know that the small dealer can not examine all the food in the packages that come to him. He orders by the half dozen or five dozen or gross, or whatever it may be, and he can not stop to inquire into everything that is sent him. Therefore I intended to make the original compounder or preparer of that food responsible entirely, because it is impossible to hold the retailer responsible when he has not the ability to correct any of these frauds.

Mr. McCUMBER. The point I wanted to make with the Senator was that his amendment did advance Federal law over the police power of the State and nullify the police power to that extent.

Mr. MONEY. Well, that is a different thing——

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the point I desired to make. The Senator said his amendment did not interfere with the State police power.

Mr. MONEY. I want to say to the Senator that there are very learned judges of the Supreme Court who differ upon the same state of facts, upon the same law, upon the same arguments, and the same Constitution. So it is not at all strange that two men with antagonistic views on this floor should differ a particle upon a proposition. The Senator holds to his view and I hold to mine. I think that is satisfactory to me at any rate.

Mr. President, I do not know that I am able to continue this debate, because I am suffering with a very severe physical disability. My old enemy, a neuralgic headache, has possession of me as usual, and I shall for the present conclude by asking unanimous consent to incorporate in the RECORD, as an appendix to my remarks, certain provisions taken from the food laws of Great Britain, and acts of the British Parliament and of several States in regard to a number of matters that come up in the consideration of my substitute. There are also a number of other things here that I should like to have printed. I will ask to have them all printed in the RECORD.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, it has not been practicable for me to give the subject of this bill and the substitute the attention I should like. I should be glad, if it would not inconvenience the Senator from Mississippi, if in brief words he would explain the difference between the bill and the substitute which he has offered on the relative jurisdiction of the State and the Federal authorities. In other words, if either the bill itself or the substitute of the Senator from Mississippi provides for the regulation of merely manufacturing establishments within a State, irrespective of transportation from one State to another or between the States and Territories of the country, I should like to know that, because, as I understand, there is no authority on the part of the Federal Government to regulate manufactures in that sense. So far as the purpose of my present statement is concerned, it is only when those manufactures are being shipped within the meaning of the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution that the Federal authorities or the Congress of the United States have any authority to regulate or control them. As I stated, not having much opportunity to look into these matters with reference to that question, if it would not inconvenience the Senator from Mississippi, I should be glad if he would explain the difference in that respect between the bill itself and his substitute.

Mr. MONEY. I am very sorry that I am not able to go into it any further. But I will say to the Senator that the substitute which I have offered provides only that the Government of the United States shall interfere in the matter of transportation; and if any shipper or consignor or deliverer of goods shall purchase goods in the vehicles of transportation from another State, he can do that under the Federal law, but he must tag or brand or label them so plainly that you can trace them back to the shipper or manufacturer, who will then be liable to the penalty of fine or imprisonment if the articles that he has transmitted, delivered, or shipped, or transported in original packages, contain anything that is fraudulent or deleterious to the public health. After the package has been received the State law operates in its breakage and distribution.

I want to say, Mr. President, that what the Senator said about punishment for the infringement of State laws is incorrect. He said that under this act it can not be done. The State laws can proceed. This bill provides that the dealer can not be punished, under the provisions of this act, if the goods are labeled or tagged with the name of the manufacturer. They can punish just as they could, and as they have a right to do, no matter whatever legislation we enact.

I regret, Mr. President, that I can not proceed any further; but I will ask the liberty to have the matter I have referred to inserted as an appendix to my remarks. I may later get into the debate under the ten-minute rule.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the matter referred to by the Senator from Mississippi will be printed in the RECORD as an appendix to his remarks.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DEFENDANT ENTITLED TO PARTICULARS OF OFFENSE CHARGED.

[English sale of food and drugs act, 1899; Law Reports 62 and 63 Vict.; Statutes 36–37, 1899.]

Page 200, section 19, paragraph 2: In any prosecutions under the sale of food and drugs act the summons shall state particulars of the offense or offenses alleged, and also the name of the prosecutor, and shall not be made returnable in less time than fourteen days from the day on which it is served; and there must be served therewith a copy of any analyst's certificate obtained on behalf of the prosecutor.

PROSECUTIONS STARTED WITHIN REASONABLE TIME.

Kentucky.—The food law of Kentucky permits the use of preservatives when the fact of their presence in the food is stated on the label.

DIVIDING SAMPLES.

Delaware.—Food law requires that samples taken be divided into two equal parts, and one part offered to person in whose possession article was found, with written notice of time, place, and date, when and where said sample was taken, and that it was taken to be analyzed.

Massachusetts.—Food law requires that before sample is analyzed a portion thereof shall be reserved and sealed by the analyst, and upon complaint against any person such reserve portion shall, upon application, be delivered to the defendant or his attorney.

He shall afterwards retain one of said parts for future comparison, and submit the third part, if he deems it right to have the article analyzed, to the analyst.

(Eastman Co. v. Reichenbach, 20 N. Y. Supp., 110.)

COMPENSATION FOR SAMPLES.

Colorado.—Requires that compensation be given.
Connecticut.—Requires that market price be tendered.
Florida.—Requires tender of price of quantity required for analysis.
Idaho.—Requires tender of value of sample.
Kansas.—Requires tender of value of sample.
Kentucky.—Requires tender of market price of sample.
Massachusetts.—Requires tender of value of sample.
Michigan.—Value of sample must be paid.
North Carolina.—Requires tender and payment of full selling price of sample.
Ohio.—Requires tender of value of sample.

The Heyburn bill is a measure intended to regulate the retail sales of foods and drugs in the Territories, District of Columbia, and insular possessions, and, in addition, to regulate interstate and foreign commerce in foods and drugs.

It includes food used by man or by domestic animals.

The Heyburn bill is not a direct and complete law. It is not a law that contains all of itself within itself. It depends for its effect and operation upon rules and regulations that may be made by officials given discretionary and arbitrary powers, and these rules and regulations are not incorporated in the law so that they can be understood and the effect of the law determined.

Under section 3 of the Heyburn bill power is given to the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Agriculture, and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to "make uniform rules and regulations for the collection and examination of specimens of foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, etc.," and this power is not defined in any way. It does not specify what right the party has from whom the samples are to be taken; his interest in the matter is not considered. The rules and regulations these officials may make may be extremely fair; but, on the other hand, it is just as possible that they may be extremely drastic, unreasonable, and unfair. No one can determine what the effect of this section will be until after the bill has been passed and in effect and the rules and regulations have been made.

Section 4 of the Heyburn bill gives the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture the right to analyze samples of food and drugs and medicines and liquors for the purpose of determining whether they are adulterated or misbranded, and it goes on further to say that if it shall appear from such examination that such specimens are adulterated or misbranded or contain any added deleterious substances or ingredients the Secretary of Agriculture shall give notice to the parties from whom the samples were taken, and also give public notice of the fact that such article is adulterated or misbranded. The effect of this is that the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture has the right to determine what this law means and whether an article is adulterated or not adulterated under it, and whether a substance is injurious to health or not. The courts of the land are not taken into consideration in this matter at all, but the law prescribes, in effect, that the Secretary of Agriculture, on the finding and interpretation of the Bureau of Chemistry, shall proceed at once to publicly condemn the goods and warn "all other persons, association of persons, or corporations" in whose possession like articles may be found or known to be that such article is adulterated or misbranded under this act.

Wherein does a man have "his day in court" under this section? What right has the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture to interpret the laws of the land to any extent, and cause citizens to be punished on that interpretation by public condemnation of their goods by the Secretary of Agriculture? Why is a man not entitled to a trial before a court and jury before his goods are publicly condemned and all people warned that his goods do not comply with the national law? Should he not be given an opportunity to defend his name and the reputation of his goods? This section nullifies the rights of the individual citizen and would permit an unwarranted usurpation of power on the part of the Bureau of Chemistry, and ignores the province of the courts of the country, whose high and noble duty it is to interpret the laws of the land and give all citizens fair and impartial hearings before they are injured, even in the slightest degree. Such arbitrary and uncontrolled power as this section seeks to confer upon the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture and the Secretary of Agriculture should not be tolerated in any country that boasts of freedom and equality before the law. If any official is to be given power to take steps that will injure any citizen, without going into the regular channels of justice to do it, then let that official be compelled to give a bond or some other assurance that if he makes a mistake and injures any citizen that citizen can have some redress, so that the official can not screen himself behind his official position. The proper way to enforce any law is to submit the facts, or the evidence obtained, to a court of justice, and let that court determine, from those facts and from that evidence, whether or not the law has been violated. The Bureau of Chemistry and the Secretary of Agriculture should be compelled to follow this course and no other.

The Heyburn bill also seeks to create a dangerous condition for the manufacturers of drugs when it attempts to regulate "any substance intended to be used for the cure, mitigation, or prevention of disease," and also states that a drug shall be deemed to be misbranded if it contains any statement false or misleading in any particular, and does not in any way determine what is meant by the term "false or misleading in any particular." This again leaves it in the hands of the Bureau of Chemistry to determine what is "false or misleading." Under such a law no man would dare to tell the qualifications of his drug, or that his medicine or preparation was good for the cure, mitigation, or prevention of a disease, unless he first went to the Bureau of Chemistry and consulted them and asked them if his medicine was, in their estimation, good for the cure of that disease. They would not have to prove it under this bill, because they have a far more effective way of driving the article off the market by giving publicity to what they determine and decide about the article. Such power should not be placed in any man's hands.

Section 4 also seeks to give parties accused a hearing before the officials enforcing the law, under rules established by those officials; but the food manufacturers do not ask such hearings. They want a law they can understand and abide by, and they are just as willing to take their chances in the courts as any other class of people.

The Heyburn bill is also indefinite in paragraph 4 of the definitions of adulterated food, when it says that an article of food shall be deemed to be adulterated if it contains any added ingredient which may render such article injurious to human health. Who is going to determine what is an injurious ingredient? Under this bill a manufacturer can not tell what he can use or what he can not use, and it is entirely within the power of the Bureau of Chemistry, under section 4, to determine "whether such article * * * contains any poisonous or other substance deleterious to the health of human beings or domestic animals; * * * and public notice of the facts (determined by them) shall be given by publication * * * to all other persons," etc. Who can understand the meaning of this section, and where is the fair-minded man who will say that it is right to give the Bureau of Chemistry the power to determine such a question and to give the Secretary of Agriculture the right, on the finding of the Bureau of Chemistry, to drive a man's business out of existence by publicly classing his goods as illegal on the findings of fact and their own interpretation of the law?

Again, the Heyburn bill is indefinite and dangerous when it says that proprietary preparations which do not contain any poisonous or deleterious ingredients shall not be deemed to be adulterated if they are labeled to indicate that they are mixtures, compounds, combinations, imitations, or blends, and says, further:

"Provided, That the same shall be labeled, branded, or tagged, so as to show that they are of such character. And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as requiring or compelling proprietors or manufacturers of proprietary goods which contain no unwholesome added ingredients to disclose their formulas of production, except in so far as the provisions of this act may be required to secure freedom from adulteration or imitation."

Who is going to determine just how far a man may be compelled to disclose his formula in order "to secure freedom from adulteration or imitation?" Is this law definite on this point? Can any man understand it? Do the owners of proprietary preparations of the United States know what the effect of this law will be on their articles?

The food manufacturers of the United States are in favor of a proper national food law, but they want a food law that they can understand, and they are unalterably opposed to placing the regulation of their business within the arbitrary power of any official. They are willing to submit to laws passed by their Congressmen and Senators after they have had an opportunity to have their Congressmen and Senators understand their side of the case, but they are not willing that those Congressmen and Senators should delegate their lawmaking power to the Bureau of Chemistry or to the Secretary of Agriculture or to anyone else, or that those Congressmen or Senators should create a law that will depend for its effect, not upon the interpretation of the courts of the land, but upon the interpretation of the individual officials.

The Heyburn bill does not prescribe any specific regulation within itself that will protect retail dealers or anyone else. It merely prescribes that any person who can establish a proper guaranty signed by the wholesaler, jobber, or manufacturer, or other person shall be exempt and the guarantor liable. But it is not mandatory and makes it necessary for the retailer or person seeking protection to demand a guaranty or see that he gets one. The bill does not directly afford him protection, and the bill of the National Food Manufacturers' Association seeks to do this in so far as possible.

The Hepburn bill in the House is almost a counterpart of the Heyburn bill, but contains another objectionable and unfair feature. It provides, in section 7, that the Secretary of Agriculture shall fix standards of food products for the guidance of officials enforcing the law and for the information of the courts and determine the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness of preservatives and other substances used in food. This means that we would have to wait for the establishment of these standards before we could tell the effect of the law. The food manufacturers of the country are decidedly opposed to giving the Secretary of Agriculture or any other official the arbitrary power to regulate the food supply of the country, and they insist that in the framing of such standards and in the determination of such issues they have a voice and a vote, either directly or through their duly elected representatives in Congress.

THE PROPOSED BILL EXPLAINED BY SECTIONS.

Title.—The bill seeks to regulate commerce in foods, drinks, confections, condiments, and drugs.

Section 1.—This section seeks to make it unlawful to do an interstate commerce in misbranded or adulterated foods or drugs. This includes commerce among the States and Territories, District of Columbia, and insular possessions, and between this country and foreign countries. It makes it unlawful to deliver for shipment or ship adulterated foods or drugs as articles of interstate or foreign commerce. It also makes it unlawful to receive adulterated foods or drugs as articles of interstate commerce and deliver them in original unbroken packages if they do not bear the name and address of the original shipper. It also makes it unlawful to introduce adulterated food into this country.

This section prescribes the penalty for a violation of the act.

Section 2.—This section is intended to further the ends for which the bill is drawn. It contains a regulation that the name and address of the person shipping any article of food as an article of interstate commerce shall be attached to every article of food or drugs transported in interstate commerce. Notice particularly that this name is only required to be attached to the package in the form in which it is delivered for transportation. This means that if there are a dozen bottles of catsup shipped in a box, the name shall only be attached to the box, and not to each bottle contained in the box; or if there are half a dozen boxes of catsup shipped in a crate, the name need only be attached to the crate. And if the article is shipped as one package in itself, without being boxed, such as a quarter of beef, then the name shall be attached to the article itself. By this regulation the original shipper can always be known by a glance at the name, and the offense of shipping adulterated or misbranded articles can be brought home to his door. And no matter who handles the goods as articles of commerce, the shipper only is responsible for their condition under this law. He is responsible, however, only while the goods remain in the original unbroken packages and as articles of interstate commerce. This regulation protects innocent dealers and places the responsibility on the man who should bear it. This section does not make it an offense to receive adulterated or misbranded goods, even though they are not labeled as required; but if a party receives any goods, whether adulterated or not, if they are not labeled as required he must at once assume the responsibility and label them with his name before he handles them as articles of interstate commerce. He can, however, take the articles out of commerce and sell them wholly within the borders of a State, in which case he would be subject only to the laws of that State. This requirement only attaches to the article as an article of commerce; and when the goods have reached their destination, and the articles cease to be articles of commerce, the requirement no longer exists, because the article is then subject only to the laws of the State in which it chances to be. Articles shipped to foreign countries are only required to comply with the laws of the foreign country to which they are shipped; but if goods are packed for export in accordance with the directions of a foreign purchaser they need not comply with any law, as the foreign purchaser is presumed to know what he wants and entitled to have the goods prepared to suit himself. He may want to use them himself; and even if he wants to sell them in a foreign country, the laws of that country should be able to deal with him successfully—at any rate he is entitled to receive from us what he asks for and is willing to pay for.

Section 3.—Places the enforcement of this bill in the Department of Commerce and Labor, and prescribes the way in which the law shall be enforced. It only gives the Secretary of Commerce and Labor power to make rules and regulations necessary to carry out the details of the work of enforcing the provisions of the law. It does not give him any power to make rules affecting citizens' property which would have the effect of law, but not incorporated in any law. It is not intended nor contemplated in this bill that any discretionary or arbitrary powers shall be granted to anyone except to a judge of a court in certain cases.

Section 4.—This section defines the manner in which samples shall be secured. It requires that a person shall be given due notice when his goods are taken for examination or analysis; that the sample be divided into three equal parts, each part to be considered as the original; that the owner receive one part, that the Government take one part, and that one part be held in reserve to be analyzed by a disinterested person in certain cases. When the owner of the article thus receives a sample of it he can defend himself; and his defense is not taken away from him by some inspector whom he never sees nor hears of until he is confronted in court with evidence wholly within the possession of the inspector, and which evidence he can not meet. This equitable method of taking samples is a feature of the English food law, and of some of our State food laws, and has long been recognized as a means of promoting justice. The defendant can offer his evidence to show what the sample contained as against the evidence of the Government, and if there be a serious dispute the judge can either let the evidence go to the jury and let them decide the matter, or, in order to arrive at a better judgment, he can order the part of the sample held in reserve analyzed and the result submitted in evidence. This will throw additional light on the issue. It will be observed, however, that while the judge may let the case go to the jury on the evidence on the first two parts of the sample, if the third part is analyzed, then he must submit the evidence on the whole three parts, whether the last-named analysis be in favor of the Government or in favor of the defendant—it is not discretionary with the judge to submit or not submit it after it has been made. This section also requires that cases shall be started within sixty days after the sample is taken on which the case may be commenced. It does not say that the cases shall be tried within that time—only started. This gives notice to defendant that he will have to stand trial, and he can look up the record of the goods and the whole transaction, and the facts would still be fresh, both with the Government and with the defendant. Under some of the State food laws cases are brought on samples a year and sometimes a year and a half after the samples are taken, and when the defendant has lost all track of them. Such cases work great injustice. This section also prohibits any prosecution until all the requirements of this bill have been complied with—that is, until the defendant has been duly notified, given a part of the sample taken, etc., and due regard has been had for the other safeguards of justice in the bill.

Section 5.—This section places the chemical work under this bill in the Division of Chemistry of the Hygienic Laboratory of the Public-Health and Marine-Hospital Service. This laboratory is especially fitted for the line of work required to be done by it under this bill. But under this section there is nothing for this Department to do but to analyze the samples and give a certificate of the results to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

Section 6.—This section requires that when violations are discovered the proper steps shall be at once taken to punish the offenders.

Section 7.—District attorneys are required to carry on prosecutions under this bill. A feature of this section is that when a prosecution is commenced the defendant shall have the right to receive from the district attorney a copy of the analysis of the article upon which proceedings have been commenced. This is only fair. The defendant is entitled to know the particulars of the offense with which he is charged just as soon as the charge is made. This has long been recognized as a fundamental principle of pleading; that is, that the plaintiff must narrate his cause of action specifically so that the defendant may know with what offense he is charged. Under the English food law a copy of the analysis is required to be served with the summons. Therefore this is not a new or strange feature.

Section 8.—This section makes it the duty of every person handling goods as articles of interstate commerce to sell a sample of the same to the proper officers of the Government. This also includes jobbers, brokers, etc., or any person entitled to the possession or control of the articles.

Section 9.—This section is intended to prevent an abuse of power by anyone enforcing this bill, such as has been done by many of the State food commissioners. In the first place, the section gives the Secretary of Commerce and Labor the right to publish bulletins of his work done under this bill, the same as other bulletins of his Department; that is, he may state the amount of work he has done, the number of samples found to be pure; the number found to be adulterated; number of cases started; his method of enforcing this law, and other general and useful information; but it prohibits him from advertising the goods of some manufacturers which happen to be picked up by inspectors and found to be pure. The results of analyses may be mentioned, but no dealer should be given free advertising at the expense of the Government to the disadvantage of other dealers whose goods are just as good, but which the inspectors do not happen to pick up.

But the salient feature of this section is that the name of a dealer, or the name of a brand, shall not be published in connection with adulterated or misbranded articles until he has had a trial and been regularly convicted and the case has been finally adjudicated if appealed. If it were not for this restriction the names of dealers could be published in connection with goods alleged to be illegal on the mere finding of a chemist, when afterwards the dealer might be able to establish in court that his goods were not adulterated or misbranded and that the chemist was wrong in his finding. Some of the State food commissioners do not hesitate to publish in their annual reports a long list of foods as adulterated and illegal, and to give the names of the manufacturers of the same; and newspapers and journals all over the country do not hesitate to point out these brands and these manufacturers and warn consumers against them, where the only foundation for all this ruthless attack on a firm's goods and a firm's name is the finding of the State food chemist. Many times the cases are never brought into court, the evidence being so slight and uncertain that the commissioner does not care to undertake to prove what he has alleged to be a fact. A firm's name should be protected, and it is not right that it should be abused on the mere technical finding of a chemist. There is always an issue of fact as to whether a man's goods are adulterated or not, and every citizen of this country is entitled to have issues of fact directly affecting him and injuring him decided by a jury of the land, and no chemist has the right to take the place of a jury and decide such matters. If a man is charged with murder there is no one calls him a murderer until he has been convicted of the crime. He may be "suspected of murder," or "the supposed murderer," etc., but the fixing of the crime on him usually awaits the verdict of the jury. But under the food laws, if a chemist asserts he finds articles adulterated the formality of a trial is waived without consulting the dealer, and he is proclaimed guilty and his goods declared adulterated. This section protects a citizen against such action until he has enjoyed the privilege of a trial under the law of the land and has had "his day in court."

Section 10.—In this section the term "food" is defined, and includes drinks, confections, and condiments, and also includes substances like baking powder, spices, etc., which technically might not be classed as food.

Section 11.—This section defines what shall be considered adulterated or misbranded articles. The various paragraphs speak for themselves and need not be commented on here. Care has been taken to make them cover every possible form of adulteration.

The fourth paragraph of section 11, page 9, provides that an article of food shall be deemed to be adulterated if it contains any substance the amount of which that might reasonably or advantageously be used in food will injure health, or contains any substance which renders the article injurious to health. This means that, while large amounts of a certain substance might injure health if generally used in food, yet if a small amount only of that substance need be used in food, or would be likely to be used in food, and it is advantageous to use that substance in that amount, and the general use of that substance in that amount will not injure health, then the food shall not be deemed to be adulterated merely because it contains that substance.

The proviso on page 10, specifying what shall not be deemed to be adulterated articles, is very important and requires careful consideration:

The first exception relates to articles which are different from any recognized class of articles of food. For instance, vanilla extract is a recognized article of food and has a definite character; but there are thousands of artificial vanilla flavors on the market that are not recognized articles of food, because they have no definite character. They are made in many different ways and from different substances, and about the only thing in common among them is that they have a vanilla flavor. So with lemon extract; it has its imitations, having no quality of lemon extract except the flavor. So with maple sirup and many other food substances which are imitated. This section aims to have all such substances labeled, so as to distinguish them from every recognized class of articles of food, and also to have them labeled so that they must be sold on their own merit. Care is taken to protect valuable preparations by specifying that it shall be a sufficient compliance with this law, if they are labeled with their own distinctive names, instead of disclosing the ingredients on the label to show their character, as required in some States. The purchaser then must use his judgment as to whether he wants to buy it or not. When the law protects the buyer from injury to health and from a fraud, then he has been sufficiently protected and warned, and it is ridiculous to attempt to draft a law which will relieve him from using his own discretion and making his own bargains as he sees fit. This section also encourages manufacturers to discover and manufacture articles of real merit, because when all such articles stand on their own merit the better articles have the advantage. But under the system in vogue in some of the States, where a dealer is compelled to publish the ingredients of a proprietary article on the label, there is no encouragement to discover and use a valuable article, because in order to sell it the manufacturer must disclose the ingredients of the article to the public and other people immediately steal his discovery and make use of it.

The second exception deals with the use of colors in food.

The third exception undertakes to deal with one of the most important questions met with in connection with food laws—that is, the use of preservatives in food. That the use of preservatives in food is a necessity is demonstrated every day by actual facts, and the question would soon be settled in favor of their legitimate use if the scientists who endeavor to prove that they should not be used would only exert one-half of the energy thus spent in ascertaining the great injury which is being done every day to the human race on account of a failure to use them in food and giving such information to the public. Even without any investigation on the subject there is scarcely a day that passes in which the newspapers of the country do not contain an account of deaths from ptomaine poisoning in food, and other food poisoning, which could have been wholly prevented by the use of preservatives. That people die from eating food not properly preserved from the ravages of bacteria is a fact demonstrated every day of our lives, and if every death thus resulting were recorded the record would be astounding. On the other hand, there is not one case on record of the death of any human being from the judicious use of chemical or other preservatives. In view of actual facts open to any careful observer every day, the law should require that a preservative be used rather than prohibit its use, especially so when the use of a preservative is a commercial necessity.

The fourth paragraph fixes the amount that may be permissible of each commonly used preservative. The amount is intended to be sufficient to preserve the food and no more.

This section draws a very distinct line between food adulteration and food preservation; and it attempts only to regulate the use of preservatives.

In order to meet the objection that some preservatives do not generally reveal their presence, like vinegar, salt, etc., the proviso at the end of this section requires that the name of any substance used in food as an added substance, whether as a preservative or otherwise, shall be stated on the label, in order to give the public due notice of its presence.

A man has as much right to use a preservative in food, when he states the fact of its presence, as he has to use salt, if that preservative as used is not any more injurious to health than is salt. To try to regulate otherwise is to discriminate between substances on the same plane. If the use of salt, or the use of vinegar in certain quantities is not injurious, then the use of other substances no more injurious as used than salt or vinegar must be permitted under regulations to prevent fraud only.

It is needless to add that preservatives are never used as an adulteration. It is an additional expense to put them into food, and they are used in so small quantities that they do not serve any purpose but that of preserving the food; and as that is a legitimate purpose it should be recognized and regulated, but not prevented.

The full necessity for this regulation may not be apparent to those who are not familiar with food laws and supreme court decisions on them. The term "injurious to health" is a very broad one, and its interpretation is usually left to the whim of the official enforcing the law. We have at least one supreme court decision (Pa.) on this point, and it is important that we notice it. That decision interprets this phrase to mean that any substance which is injurious to health in any quantity can not be used at all. Under that decision it is within the power of any food commissioner to prohibit the use of almost any substance used as ordinary articles of food. Under it vinegar can not be used, for acetic acid will surely injure if taken even in moderate quantities; wine can not be sold, for anyone knows that alcohol will injure health if taken in excessive quantities; and so with the acid of lemons, and almost every other substance used every day in food. But none of these substances will injure health if taken judiciously. Therefore while these words "injurious to health" sound very well and seem to have a simple meaning, yet unless they are qualified they open the way for untold trouble and uncertainty.

Under existing food laws a manufacturer can not tell what he can use and what he can not use; and no food law is perfect that does not settle, to some extent at least, this important question.

Section 12.—This section relates to the misbranding of food. This section is very broad and is intended to prohibit every possible attempt at fraud or deception. The labeling requirements of this section relate to the labels on the articles themselves or on their containers. The various paragraphs speak for themselves and need no explanation here. Suffice it to say that they contain some features not incorporated in other food laws and are more stringent than other food-law requirements.

Section 13.—This section prevents the possibility of any specific standards for food being used and given the effect of law in prosecutions under this bill. It is not proper that the standards of any person or set of persons should be consulted to the exclusion of others just as good or better under any law. With drugs it is somewhat different, as the standard for them relates to their strength only, whereas the standards for food relate to the ingredients, methods of preparation, etc., and these are so varied that it is a far more difficult matter to adjust than it is to fix a standard for drugs. This section recognises the principle that if any standards for food are to be given effect they should be duly considered by the representatives of the people and incorporated into a law. It is necessary to take the precaution which is taken in this section in order not to have this law misconstrued, as some of our State supreme courts have already given full effect to private standards not mentioned in any law (State v. Jennings, Mich.). This bill practically establishes standards for all articles by specifying what are below standard; and it leaves the question of whether an article is a standard article or not to be proved as any other matter of fact is proved in law, by the best evidence obtainable, and all of the best evidence obtainable, if it is desired to offer it; and it recognizes the fact that a jury of intelligent American citizens are capable of determining, under the proper evidence, whether an article of food is a standard article or not, or whether it has been prepared in a standard and proper way or not.

This proviso also protects food that contains natural preservatives, and which is now sometimes prosecuted under the State food laws.

Section 14.—This section defines what is meant by the term "drug," and makes the United States Pharmacopœia and the National Formulary the standards for all drugs recognized in those books as drugs or medicines. It will be observed, however, that this only applies to drugs that are intended to be used as medicines. Drugs that are intended for commercial purposes only are not affected by the provisions of this bill.

Section 15.—This section enumerates the cases in which a drug shall be deemed to be adulterated. This section also only applies to drugs that are intended to be used as medicines. The first two paragraphs explain themselves.

The proviso at the end of the section is relative to proprietary preparations. In this proviso the bill again recognizes the principle that when goods are sold on their own merit no fraud can well be practiced. Under this provision all articles that have distinctive names of their own, and are thus distinguished from all other articles, are not affected by the provisions of this section, and are permitted to go before the public on their own merit.

Section 16.—This section aims to prevent fraud and deception in the branding of drugs and medicines as far as possible. One difference between this section and the sections of other food laws defining misbranded drugs is that this section contains nothing regarding claims made in behalf of medicines telling of their merits, etc. From the very nature of medicines, and considering the purposes for which they are intended to be used, it is difficult to make any other reasonable regulation. It is quite impossible to restrict the statements which may be made regarding such articles as proprietary preparations or medicines, because a medicine may be an excellent cure for a certain disease under certain conditions and accomplish all that is claimed for it, but under other conditions it might have no effect whatever, through no fault of the medicine. It does not follow that a statement to the effect that a certain medicine will cure a certain disease is false when the medicine fails to cure the disease in all cases and under all conditions. Therefore, to incorporate into a national food law a provision the violation of which could never be proved with any degree of certainty would be very unwise and open the way for endless and hopeless litigation.

Section 17.—Exempts common carriers as such from the provisions of this bill.

CONCLUSION.

A great deal more might well be said in explanation of what a proper food law should contain, as the subject is a very broad one, and the more it is duly considered the more apparent its magnitude and importance becomes, and a great deal more might be said in explanation of points which will undoubtedly occur to a careful reader of this bill. It is hard to cover such a field in one law; but taken all in all, it is hoped that in this bill the most important features of such legislation have been taken up and given careful consideration, favoring no interests or substances, and discriminating against none; but regulating all on principles that will promote justice to all.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, right here, and for a very few moments only, I should like to reply to the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], and to give my attention almost solely to his amendment.

The Senator made some statement here, which was not in the form of a complaint, concerning the language, possibly, that I used in opening the case the other day in reference to his substitute. What I desired to say then, and what I insist upon now, knowing the absolute sincerity and integrity of the Senator, is that I think he has been imposed upon with reference to the true motive of this proposed substitute. That is as far as I desired to go at that time, and it is as far as I desire to go at this time. I think there is such a thing as being imposed upon with reference to the motive of somebody else, and not with reference to the motive of the Senator himself.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him right there?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. MONEY. Of course, I am greatly obliged to the Senator for his good opinion of my character, but I do not feel complimented at all by his estimate of my intellect.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will let the Senator be the judge of that when he reads over, and reads carefully, his own amendment.

Mr. MONEY. That is another subject.

Mr. McCUMBER. Who compose the National Association of Pure Food Manufacturers? Does the Senator from Mississippi know? Neither he nor any Senator on this floor knows of whom it is composed. It is composed of manufacturers of certain kinds of food products; but who are they? What is the name of a single manufacturer that constitutes this body of pure-food manufacturers? Can the Senator from Mississippi give me the name of one? It is not given to the world, and the world knows nothing to-day about the personnel of that national pure-food congress, or whatever you may call it.

It is true that the National Association of Manufacturers have heretofore again and again resolved in favor of what is substantially the Hepburn bill. Now comes this other National Association of Pure-Food Manufacturers, and they say that they are in favor of a pure-food bill, although they wish something entirely different from that which the Senate has had before it for some time past.

The Senator from Mississippi says that his substitute has been carefully constructed; that it has been carefully provided for in all its details. Mr. President, that is absolutely true. It has been carefully prepared for the object for which it has been given to the world. What is that object? First, to prevent, if possible, the enactment of any pure-food law; and, second, if that is impossible, to secure the enactment of a food law which will enable those manufacturers to enter the States out of which they would be kicked to-day. It is an attempt, on their part, to get into the State, notwithstanding the particular laws of that State.

There was an association meeting in Atlantic City, N. J., from the 12th until the 14th of this month. That association consisted of the Western Canned Goods Association and the Atlantic States Packing Association. They formed the two associations that met at Atlantic City on the 12th to the 14th of February. The packers of canned vegetables and fruits of all the States east of the Rocky Mountains and north of the Gulf States, with the exception of the Pacific coast States, were represented in this body, and while they were not members of this association, California and Oregon had representatives at this meeting. They are the manufacturers of canned goods.

Mr. O. L. Deming, of Chicago, is president of the National Association of Pure Food Manufacturers, which, as I say, is opposed entirely to the Hepburn bill, and is in favor of overriding all State laws. He desired to be heard before this association at Atlantic City, N. J. Here is the statement that is given to me by the president of that association, who presided during this meeting. During those deliberations they passed a resolution in favor of these pure-food laws. Mr. Deming, of Chicago, wished to be heard, as I stated, on the floor of the convention in the interest of what is known as the "Lannan bill," which is the same as the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi. This is what Mr. Fraser, president of the Western Canned Goods Association, says:

I, as presiding officer, stated to him that if he would give me the names of the members of his association, and if they were reputable manufacturers or packers of canned vegetables or fruits, that notwithstanding the fact that he was not a member of either of the associations comprising the convention, he could speak in the interests of these reputable food manufacturers or canners. He stated to me that he would not divulge the names of their membership. He did mention the name of one manufacturer, but would not mention the others. I stated to him that so long as he would not divulge their names he could not speak. He refused absolutely to do so, and consequently was not given a hearing.

It is proper for me at this stage to state who the president of this association was. He says of himself:

I, in common with all canners in the State of Wisconsin, pack almost exclusively green peas in hermetically sealed cans. We use in our packing no other ingredients than sugar, salt, and water, in addition to the vegetables themselves. We sterilize our goods and cans by the use of heat. It costs the company that I represent from $5,000 to $10,000 for the sugar we use. In placing our goods on the market in other States they come into competition with peas packed where saccharine has been used as sweetener. Saccharine is a coal-tar product entirely, and in comparison with the price of sugar is very much cheaper. For instance, where the cost of sugar in our season's output is $10,000, in round numbers, it would cost the packer in other States where saccharine is used about $750. At the annual joint convention of the two associations above referred to resolutions were unanimously adopted indorsing pure-food legislation, this being done after a thorough discussion of the matter with Doctor Wiley. A rising vote was called for, and every man in the room got on his feet. Upon the noes being called for every one remained in his seat, so that it was a unanimous vote. While no particular bill is mentioned in these resolutions, they were meant to apply to the measures now before Congress.

Mr. MONEY. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him right there, as I must leave the Chamber?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. McCUMBER. Always, with pleasure.

Mr. MONEY. The Senator says that he does not know the name of a single one of the people composing this association, and he ventures to say that I do not and that nobody else does, and then he proceeds to read this statement. Here [exhibiting] is the list of membership. I never heard before that there was any secrecy about it; I never heard before that any man had ever made an effort to get the names of the members of this association and had failed to get them. Here they are by the page, and I will ask the Secretary to read them, if the Senator will permit me in his time, and the Senator will see who the men are composing this association.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not know how long the list is, but if the Senator has the names, they can be printed probably.

Mr. MONEY. There is plenty of time.

Mr. SCOTT. Would it not do to have them printed in the RECORD?

Mr. MONEY. I suppose it would do some people just as well, but I have permitted my time to be absorbed since I have been on the floor by other Senators. I made no objection to that because I want all the light possible.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no objection to the Senator taking all the time he wants.

Mr. MONEY. Oh, yes; the Senator has made a positive statement here that I did not know the name of a solitary man composing the association; that he did not know one, and that nobody else did. Now, it is time to hit the nail when it is in. Let us hit it right now.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator how many pages he has there?

Mr. MONEY. Well, there are a good many. The members of the association are all put down there by name, their numbers are given, their streets, their cities, and their States.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will not take the time now, the list of names can be printed in the RECORD. It would take about half an hour to read them, according to his statement. I do not wish to keep the Senate waiting half an hour. But if the names are printed in the RECORD we can all get at them in the morning. That would do just as well.

Mr. MONEY. I find there is no economy of my time and a great deal of economy of the time of the Senator from North Dakota. Of course, if he does not permit me to have the names read, I shall have to ask that they be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will object at this time.

Mr. MONEY. I think on the spot is a pretty good time to have the names read, but I am willing to have them printed, if the Senator objects to their being read.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will simply object at this time. If the Senator wishes to put them in after I have gotten through, all right.

Mr. MONEY. I ask that the list of the members of the National Food Manufacturers' Association be printed in the RECORD as an appendix to my speech.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the list referred to by the Senator from Mississippi will be printed as requested.

Mr. MONEY. I should have preferred to have it read now if it had suited the Senator from North Dakota.

[The list of names referred to will be found in the appendix to Mr. MONEY's remarks on another page of to-day's RECORD.]

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say that I should be very glad to get the names of those manufacturers, and I wish I could get out also what they are manufacturing, before we get through with this debate.

Mr. President, I want to take up the substitute itself, and while I will not take up all of the sections, I will call attention to just a few of them. I stated some days ago that this would no more prohibit the introduction of fraudulent and spurious goods in any State than a sieve would hold water, and I say that to-day, and I will attempt to establish it by the instrument itself. Every section will assist me in proving that simple proposition. Let us take section 2:

That every person, firm, or corporation who shall ship or transport, or deliver for shipment or transportation, from any State or Territory, the Disrtict of Columbia, or insular possession, to any other State or Territory, the District of Columbia, or insular possession, for pay or otherwise, any article of food or drugs, shall securely attach, in a conspicuous place, to every such article of food or drugs, in the form in which it is thus shipped or transported, or delivered for shipment or transportation as aforesaid (whether such form be as one individual article, package, crate, or bundle of packages), a durable label, brand, or tag, upon which shall be printed or written in the English language, so as to be easily discernible, the correct name and address, in some State or Territory, the District of Columbia, or insular possession, of the person, firm, or corporation shipping or transporting the same or delivering the same for shipment or transportation.

You will see that all the section provides for is that the shipper shall label his goods; that if they will label where the goods come from, they are not compelled to do anything else with reference to them; and the section requires that there be securely attached in a conspicuous place "a durable label, brand, or tag, upon which shall be printed or written in the English language, so as to be easily discernible, the correct name and address, in some State or Territory, the District of Columbia, or insular possession, of the person, firm, or corporation shipping or transporting the same or delivering the same for shipment or transportation." The retailer, after he has broken the bundle, may destroy this entirely, and may sell all of the goods or articles in smaller packages without even that showing.

Then it provides:

And no person, firm, or corporation shall be convicted under the provisions of this act for having received in any State or Territory, the District of Columbia, or insular possession, from any other State or Territory, the District of Columbia, insular possession, or from a foreign country, and delivered in original unbroken packages, for pay or otherwise, any article of food or drugs adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, if said article is labeled, branded, or tagged, in manner and form as required aforesaid, at the time of so receiving and delivering said articles.

In other words, all that it is necessary for the manufacturer of the spurious article to do is to brand his goods, showing the manufacturer of them, and then they may be sold in original unbroken packages in any State in the Union. After they have been so sold and have become scattered so that they can become a part of the mass of the property of the State, then if you can root them out you can do so. But he is careful to see that they shall be sold before they can possibly be reached, and with nothing but his bare name upon them.

It goes further, following right along:

Provided, That any person, firm, or corporation who shall receive in any State or Territory, the District of Columbia, or insular possession, from any other State or Territory, the District of Columbia, insular possession, or from a foreign country, any article of food or drugs not labeled, branded, or tagged in the manner and form as required herein shall label, brand, or tag said article with their correct name and address before delivering the same, for pay or otherwise, in the original unbroken package.

In other words, if the seller of the articles, knowing them to be spurious, shall simply put upon them the brand of the manufacturer he may sell them in the State, notwithstanding the State has laws absolutely prohibiting their sale in that State. It looks to me as though the attempt and desire of this measure was to enable the manufacturer of questionable products to ship his goods into a State, whose laws would prohibit the introduction or the sale of those articles in that State, and to prevent any punishment whatever, if they are in original, unbroken packages bearing the name of the manufacturer.

I come now to section 3:

That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall organize in the Department of Commerce and Labor a bureau to be known as the Bureau of Foods and Drugs; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to enforce the provisions of this act through the said Bureau of Foods and Drugs.

How is any bureau to enforce the provisions of a criminal statute? How is the bureau to determine what evidence the court shall receive and what it shall not receive in a criminal case? What has the bureau to do with the prosecution or the enforcement of the law in any way other than the mere fact of securing samples and analyzing them?

The measure that has been introduced here and which has the support of the Committee on Manufactures simply provides that the Secretary of Agriculture shall assist in ascertaining what misbranded or fraudulent goods are shipped from one State to another, and if he finds that there are such goods being shipped, he does not enforce the provisions of the law. He gets the goods in any way he has a mind to and analyzes them, and if he finds that they do not conform to the requirements of the law, the manufacturer may be notified, and he can show, if he sees fit, that the specimens examined were not manufactured by him, or had been tampered with since, or that the analysis is an incorrect one, or anything else in defense that he can establish. Then, if the Secretary of Agriculture is not satisfied, he may still report the matter to the district attorney of the proper district, and say, "If you feel that you can convict this man beyond a reasonable doubt of the commission of a crime, you may proceed to prosecute the case." It is left finally in the hands of the district attorney. Certainly no manufacturer could object to having all those safeguards thrown around.

This section of the substitute provides for a Bureau of Foods and Drugs in the office of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor. Tell me why it should be taken away from the Department of Agriculture. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, if it is necessary, to change from the Bureau of Analysis of the Department of Agriculture to this other Bureau, but as yet I have not heard a solitary reason why it should be so changed. We already have a law that the Secretary of Agriculture shall examine the imports into this country, and if he finds they are fraudulently branded, that they are adulterated or misbranded as to the place where they were manufactured, he may exclude them.

Has anyone heard any complaint about the enforcement of this law? The only complaint that could be made is that it has been enforced, and justly and rightly enforced. Those who have suffered from the enforcement of it have in no instance suffered unjustly, and they are the ones who would take away this duty from the Department of Agriculture.

Again, the Agricultural Department to-day has the examining of all articles that pertain to food products. The Secretary of Agriculture has his Bureau of Chemistry for that purpose. We have had a provision in every appropriation bill, I think, since I have been here appropriating a certain sum of money for the use of the Secretary of Agriculture to determine what are proper standards of food products. Has anyone heard of that power having been abused in the slightest degree? Has it not been beneficial to the country? He determines what is the best character of flour, that it shall contain so much of starch, so much of gluten, and so much of other ingredients. There is nothing in the provision that makes it a standard.

I for one, Mr. President, stand firmly against any man or set of men fixing a standard of food until we know more than we do to-day, by chemical analysis or otherwise, with respect to the value of foods and the real effect of any food upon the system. There are too many stomachs to be affected by a particular kind of food for us to safely say what this individual or that individual may have, or what shall be excluded from commerce and what shall be included in commerce. It seems to me that it is proper for the Secretary of Agriculture to attend to the analyses of these foods.

Now, I come to section 4, which provides that—

Any inspector, agent, officer, or other person authorized by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to procure samples, as aforesaid, shall, at the time of the taking thereof—notify the person or firm.

That is, of samples—

I wish Senators would listen a moment to the red tape that one must go through in order to get a sample that can be used in the courts; and impliedly there is a refusal on the part of Congress to allow the courts to receive anything else except a sample that is obtained in the manner which it requires seven pages of literature to determine. They are to be taken and then analyzed under the provisions of section 4.

Then notice is to be given, and before you can even purchase an article at a store for the purpose of examining it you must send for the manufacturer and he or his agent must be present while you are purchasing that article. Then it is to be divided into two or three or four parts, and they are sent here and there. Then the manufacturer's agent analyzes his part, somebody else analyzes the other part, and then a third person is to analyze another part, and when it comes before the court the court must receive these ex parte analyses before it can proceed practically with the trial of the action.

How does the bill we have recommended provide? The Secretary of Agriculture can go into any store in this city, in any city, in any State, and he can buy 500 articles of canned goods from a certain manufacturer in 500 different cities if he wishes. He can have them analyzed. He can give notice to the manufacturer that out of the 500 analyses he finds all of the goods adulterated or misbranded. All those 500 cans may be used, or any number of cans, in the court and any new analyses be introduced, and the court would take testimony the same as it would in any other case. But under the provisions of this measuse we determine what evidence shall be received and what evidence shall not be received. We make rules for the admission of evidence and then determine the weight of that evidence. We say that the ex parte analysis in the criminal case shall be prima facie evidence of its correctness, and the analysis by another person shall also be prima facie evidence, and then if those two disagree, before you can go on with the trial, you must get a third person to analyze the third portion of the can. You can not go and get a dozen other cans from as many different places and analyze them.

That is not the worst of it. Before you get through with this matter you provide another thing:

Provided, That at any time after any proceedings have been commenced under any of the provisions of this act in any United States court the defendant shall have the right to receive from said district attorney a copy of the results of any examination or analysis which will be offered in evidence against said defendant in said proceedings.

In other words, before the defendant goes upon the stand in any way he will be entitled to have not only what evidence will be used against him, not only what witnesses will testify against him, but he must have the result of that testimony, so that he may be able to meet it in a criminal case in a trial in one of the district courts of the United States. Is not that an unheard-of provision?

Now, again, Mr. President:

SEC. 9. That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may publish from time to time, in like manner as other publications of his Department, bulletins of the work done in enforcing this act, and such other information regarding the same as he may deem proper, to be distributed as public documents in like manner as other publications of his Department: Provided, That the name of any brand, or the name of any manufacturer, person, firm, or corporation, shall not be published in connection with examinations or analyses, or results of examinations or analyses, of articles of food or drugs found to comply with the provisions of this act: And provided further, That the examinations or analyses, or results of examinations or analyses, of articles of food or drugs found to be adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act shall not be published, nor the names of any person, firm, or corporation, in connection therewith, until the person, firm, or corporation so violating the provisions of this act has been regularly convicted.

We would have no objection to the second proposition, but why should you prohibit the publication of the fact that goods are pure; that goods which have been submitted to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor the analysis shows are pure; that the result of that analysis shall be held in abeyance and the public shall never know anything, except the fact that the products have been questioned, and no one who is producing an absolutely pure article shall have the right to say, "This article has been questioned; the Secretary of Agriculture has found that it is unquestionably pure." But he can not have that matter published. The object of it is this: So that we can get good goods, which would naturally interfere with and compete against poor goods, exactly on the same level with the poor or adulterated goods. In other words, that the fact of purity being established, which would enable them to compete against the poorer articles, shall not be made public and the public shall not have any knowledge of it. It can have no other meaning. It can have no other or further result.

There are a great many of these provisions. I will call attention now to a definition in section 11, I think it is. It is under the definition of "adulteration:"

Fourth. If it contains any substance or ingredient, whether added or otherwise, which, in any quantity in which it might reasonably or advantageously be used in food or drink, will injure health, or contains any substance or ingredient which, by chemical combination or otherwise, renders such article of food unwholesome or injurious to the health of the consumer.

I wish the Senator from Mississippi would explain what he means by "advantageously used." If it can be advantageously used in any food or drug, then any of these ingredients may be used under this section. I do not understand the meaning of it, and I do not know whether or not anyone else can explain it.

Again, commencing on line 25, page 12:

Second. An article of food shall not be deemed adulterated or unwholesome by reason only of being artificially colored with harmless coloring matter, if it is plainly stated on the label that said article is colored.

What is the necessity, then, if coloring is harmless, to state on the label that the product is colored? What is the use of this article? It adds nothing. There is nothing now in the law to prevent the use of any coloring matter which is not harmful.

Again:

Third. An article of food shall not be deemed adulterated or unwholesome by reason only of the addition of a harmless preservative, or by reason of the addition of any substance for legitimate purposes.

What is a legitimate purpose? In other words, it shall not be deemed adulterated if the preservative is harmless, and it shall not be deemed adulterated, though it is harmful, if it is for a legitimate purpose of preservation.

That, Mr. President, is just exactly what the manufacturers of preserves, who use boracic acid, salicylic acid, and a hundred other kinds of ingredients to preserve and to color, wish to prevent. In other words, they do not want to have the State itself enforce its laws against a food article, provided they themselves think the preservative has the legitimate purpose of preservation, or because the substance might be added for the legitimate purpose of coloring, so as to make it appear more attractive to the eye.

Again I call attention to another portion of section 4:

Fourth. That the following preservatives shall not be permissible in greater quantities than the following amounts: Boric acid, one-half of 1 per cent, or its equivalent in borax; sulphurous acid, one-twentieth of 1 per cent, or its equivalent in sodium sulphites; salicylic acid, one-tenth of 1 per cent, or its equivalent in sodium salicylate; benzoic acid, one-fifth of 1 per cent, or its equivalent in sodium benzoate; saltpeter, one-fourth of 1 per cent.

The substitute allows the use of every one of those preservatives nothwithstanding the fact that Michigan, Kentucky, Illinois, Missouri, North Dakota, South Dakota, and a dozen other States I might mention, absolutely prohibit by their laws the use of several of these ingredients in food products, claiming that it is not necessary, but that it is done for the purpose of deceiving and that in most instances they are poisons. None of us here knows how much of one of these preservatives can be safely used. But they can even avoid this by a provision found on the very next page. It says:

Provided further, That in stating the name of any added substance it shall be in compliance herewith if the trade name only of any proprietary preparation which has been added to food is plainly stated on the label of such article, if said trade name of said proprietary preparation, together with the formula of said preparation, has been placed on file with the Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

In other words, they can use any amount of boracic acid. They can use any amount of salicylic acid. They can use any other poisonous dyes or coal-tar dyes provided they will give it a proprietary name; and then the substitute provides that after the proprietary name is given, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall under no circumstances divulge the secret constituents of the proprietary article. It might be wholly salicylic acid or boracic acid, but the public shall get no knowledge whatever of its contents.

The whole object of this substitute carries out what was stated in the committee by a number of these people who I believe constitute this new association. They presented to the Committee on Manufactures this proposition. They said: "Certain coal-tar dyes and certain other ingredients used for preservatives in our opinion are not harmful, but the people of the States believe they are harmful. We say that glucose is better and more wholesome than honey or sirup, but the people have a prejudice against glucose as a substitute for honey or for sirup, and, therefore, as their prejudice is unfounded, we have a perfect right to deceive them. In other words, the people have no right to allow their simple prejudices to prevail against our foods, and if we put in salicylic acid, and we know that that acid, in the amount we use, is not injurious to health, then the people of the State have no right, acting upon their prejudice, to know what we put in our preserves." That is being carried out to perfection in the substitute. Again I call attention to section 13:

That this act shall not be construed by any specific standards for food not incorporated herein.

If it is not to be measured by any standard of foods I do not know how on earth you are going to measure it. It seems to be a mere negative clause intended to destroy the effect of any good to the people or of any danger there might be in the substitute to this particular class of manufacturers.

I come again to section 14:

That the term "drug," as used in this act, shall mean all drugs, medicines, and preparations intended for medical purposes and recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia or the National Formulary as drugs or medicines for internal or external use—

There they stop. In other words, it would not touch any of the patent medicines. It would not affect any of the frauds. It is perhaps true that 95 per cent of the drugs sold in the United States consist of patent medicines or proprietary medicines. It is perhaps also true that 95 per cent of the patent medicines are frauds, and thus they would leave this substitute as applying simply to about 5 per cent of the articles that are sold in the drug stores under prescription.

I call attention to section 17:

That for the purposes of this act an article of drugs shall be deemed to be misbranded:

* * * * * * *

Second. If it, or any package, bottle, or receptacle containing it, shall, by label, brand, or tag, or otherwise, be deceptive as to its weight or measure.

That is pretty important. They have determined in this good measure, which the Senator says has not in the slightest degree imposed upon him, that if a receptacle which purports to contain a quart contains only nine-tenths of a quart it shall be deemed misbranded, and the same is true of the goods. They seem to desire to concentrate the energies and the thought of the Senate and of Congress upon a matter of weights and measures, and they are perfectly satisfied that Congress shall provide that if any article of food or drug or liquor does not contain the weight or quantity that is stated on the bottle it shall be deemed misbranded and adulterated.

There is not, perhaps, a single manufactured article, drugs or otherwise, that does say it contains one quart or it contains one pint or anything of the kind. So if they were even attempting to reach that part of what might be considered an abuse, they would not do it. Everyone knows, outside of those of us who live in the prohibition States, that every champagne bottle has a false bottom which runs pretty near up to its neck, so that it does not hold more than about a pint, while it appears upon the outside to be a quart bottle. There is nothing which requires the manufacturer of this champagne to say that the bottle contains one quart, but if he does put that on it and it does not contain a quart, then he shall be guilty of misbranding and of adulterating.

Mr. President, I have gone very hastily over the provisions of the substitute bill, not as thoroughly as I should like, but I will submit to any Senator who will read it carefully what I stated in the beginning. It is proposed by those manufacturers whose goods are under the ban of the food laws of the several States. It seeks to prevent any pure-food law. If it can not prevent that, it seeks then to have Congress pass a law which will nullify the effect of the laws of the several States so far as it is possible.

In reading a little from the National Druggist, which is a magazine published in the interests of the drug trade and especially in the interest, as I would judge, of the manufacturers of proprietary and patent medicines, there is a heading, "How to defeat pure-food legislation." Then it proceeds to state the fact of this organization, which is the National Association of Pure Food Manufacturers. It raises them as the standard bearers of the attempt to prevent pure-food legislation. But it gives them some wholesome advice. It says the only way to deal with this question is to go right at the throat of the rascals who are trying to perpetuate a pure-food law upon the States, and not to do it in any such underhand way as this national association seems to wish to carry out its project.

Now, Mr. President, I want only to say in closing that the bill which has been introduced by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] is practically the same one that we have introduced for the past three or four years. It has for its object only supplementing the laws of the several States in their attempt to prevent the importation of misbranded and impure articles of food. It makes no standard of foods by anyone. It simply declares what shall be deemed misbranded, what shall be regarded as adulterated, and no one can object to those definitions. Then it further declares that neither misbranded nor adulterated goods shall be transported from one State to another.

The remedy is not by a pure-food commissioner saying upon his own opinion that this food contains boracic acid and it shall not be sold in the State of North Dakota or in the State of Wisconsin, but the Secretary of Agriculture can say to the persons manufacturing it, "We do not believe that your food product comes within the definitions prescribed in the law: you may have your hearing." They have their hearing. Then he is not compelled to report anything, but if he thinks they have not made out a defense or if they refuse to change the character of the ingredients, then he may say to the district attorney of the proper district, "Go ahead and prosecute your case if in your judgment it is proper."

Not only that, Mr. President, but I can go into a store here and buy canned goods, and if I find what is said to be potted chicken is composed of pig's jaw and calf's neck I can go to the prosecuting attorney myself and present that case and ask him to investigate it.

If we enact a criminal law we ought to make it so that any person can make his complaint, whether it is the Secretary of Agriculture, whether it is the food commissioner of any State, or anyone else who thinks that he has a grievance and ask that the law shall be enforced. To do that we do not want to have ten or fifteen pages of red tape and conditions under which we can get a sample, and then only to be used in certain cases, and never to be used six weeks, I think, after it has been procured. This red-tape business, Mr. President, what you have to do after you get hold of your sample, will take a longer time to go through than the statute of limitations as is provided in the bill, and after the lapse of sixty days, I think it is, the evidence could not be used at all.

I say, Mr. President, with all due deference to the views of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] I think these cases should be prosecuted the same as any other case in a criminal court. If we find that a defendant willfully and maliciously imposes upon the public and a jury of twelve men with all the evidence that either the prosecution or the defense can bring before them ascertain that he is willfully disobeying the law, then he is to be convicted; and nothing more and nothing less ought to be in a law of this character.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, during the early part of the debate on this bill the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] took occasion to refer to an article from the American Druggist, I believe it is called, the trade paper, about the action of the Minnesota Pure Food Commission in excluding Lea & Perrin's Worcestershire sauce from that State. I told the Senator at the time he quoted from the paper that I thought there was some mistake about it. I had no facts at my command, but I was not aware of the fact that that sauce had been excluded from our State.

Since then I have ascertained the facts in the case, and I desire to have the Secretary read first an article from the Minneapolis Tribune and, second, two letters from the manufacturers of this sauce explaining the whole thing.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

A BOOMERANG ATTACK.

The enemies of pure-food legislation are busy, and are especially active now in discrediting pure-food laws and officials, because of the fight that is on at Washington for national pure-food legislation. A sample of the literature being scattered abroad is the pamphlet headed "An example of the despotism of pure-food laws," reprinted from the National Druggist. It attacks the Minnesota dairy and food commissioner viciously for enforcing the law against a largely used proprietary food product, found to contain salicylic acid.

As Mr. Slater's interview in the Journal shows, the whole incident is misstated in the pamphlet. The product was not barred from Minnesota, and no man was injured in his business. The manufacturers were merely informed that their article was illegal in this State and must not be sold after January 1 unless it could be made without salicylic acid as a preservative. The manufacturers complied at once. They found that the product could be made to keep without any preservative, and they are now making it in strict conformity with the law.

If the enemies of pure-food regulation can not find better cases than the Minnesota one, they would help their cause by keeping still. The law barring salicylic acid from food products is based on the fact that its continued use is injurious to the health. Without confiscating any goods or injuring anyone, Mr. Slater has caused the manufacturers to reform their practice, and the consumers are no longer compelled to take doses of salicylic acid with this particular preparation.

The poor, injured manufacturer is given altogether too much sympathy by these defenders of personal liberty. The public health is a bigger thing than a maker's profits. The law against preservatives is plain, and there is no excuse for breaking it. As the case in point shows, there is a good deal of humbug in the claims that bottled and tinned food products will not keep without preservatives. If they will not keep in a natural state, the public will be better off without them, but the fact is that with careful and clean methods in the factory, nearly everything put up will remain unchanged without chemicals.

Our State law is a great protection to the consumers and should be supported by a strong national law and a staff of experts to enforce it. (Minneapolis Tribune, January 13, 1906.)

EXHIBIT A.

NEW YORK, December 6, 1905.

E. K. SLATER, Esq.,
Dairy and Food Commissioner, St. Paul, Minn.

DEAR SIR: Since our consulting chemist, Dr. Francis Wyatt, had the pleasant interview with you regarding Lea & Perrin's Worcestershire sauce, when you gave us permission to use a small amount of benzoic acid, and we subsequently sent you some samples, which you passed as legal, we are pleased to tell you that we have gone on experimenting, and find that we can eliminate this preservative.

We are sending you by express, charges paid, one bottle of sauce from our new makings. This is absolutely free from all preservatives, and is the sauce we are now issuing, not only to your State, but throughout the entire country.

You will remember that by your suggestion we put a special mark on the wrapper and direction label of each bottle containing benzoic acid; so, in order to avoid confusion, we have retained the red star and simply added a dash below, viz, "——." We inclose a wrapper for your inspection.

We assure you that should you find any illegal sauce on your market it will be old stock, and that any stock now shipped by us will be absolutely free from all preservatives. We thank you for your courtesy and leniency shown to us, and trust that the pleasant relations now existing will always continue.

If you feel that you can give us an analysis pronouncing the sample free from preservatives and legal in your State, we would greatly appreciate it, and we need hardly say that an announcement in your monthly bulletin would be of great benefit to us.

We beg to remain, dear sir,
Yours, very truly,
JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS.

EXHIBIT B.

NEW YORK, January 11, 1906.

EDWARD K. SLATER, Esq.,
Commissioner, Dairy and Food Department, St. Paul, Minn.

DEAR SIR: We are in receipt of your esteemed favor of the 8th instant, regarding an editorial which recently appeared in the pages of the National Druggist, of St. Louis. You are quite right in assuming that we did not instigate any criticism in the work of your department. This article only came to our attention a short time ago. We assure you that we are in no way responsible for its publication, and had nothing whatever to do with it; this was published without our knowledge or sanction.

We can only express our regrets, that after the very fair treatment you have accorded us any parties should have made use of the name of Lea & Perrins to write such an article. We were as much surprised and grieved to see it as you would have been yourself.

Thanking you for giving us this opportunity of explaining our position in the matter, we remain, dear sir,
Yours, very sincerely,
JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I desire simply to make a very brief observation concerning the papers the Senator from Minnesota sent to the desk. In the first place, the editorial from the Minnesota newspaper talks about what the enemies of pure-food legislation are trying to do, and of course I am placed in that category. The editor will be better able to judge when this debate is through and when the vote is taken whether I am an enemy of pure-food legislation or not.

Again, Mr. President, it will be observed that this commissioner of Minnesota, finding salicylic acid in Lea & Perrin's sauce (he does not say whether it was in poisonous quantities or not) in his discretion permitted it to be sold in the State for a certain length of time after which it was to be barred—that is, under his administration of the pure-food laws of Minnesota the people of that State could poison themselves by using this sauce for two or three months, and they must cease to do so after that time had expired. I think that simple suggestion shows the absurdity of the entire proceeding.

I think I may take occasion before the debate closes to show that while salicylic acid and boracic acid are perhaps poisonous in the concrete sense, yet they can be used in minute quantities, as salicylic acid has been used in minute quantities in this particular preparation, without any harm whatever to the human system.

That is all I care to say about the matter at present.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I am surprised at the statement of the Senator from New Hampshire. He intimates in his statement that the dairy and food authorities having that matter in charge concluded to let the people of the State use poison for a brief time. That is a very unfair statement. The facts were that they had a lot of goods manufactured containing certain preservatives which our State authorities said were not proper, and not to treat them harshly, in order that they might manufacture the product in a different way, they did not change the rule immediately. That the Senator criticises and finds fault with, while, in the first instance, he called attention to the arbitrary conduct of the dairy and food commission of Minnesota in excluding the sauce, when, as a matter of fact, they never absolutely excluded it.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I now renew the suggestion I made at an earlier hour to-day respecting the arrangement concerning the debate on the pending bill. I ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa offers the following, which will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

In lieu of the unanimous-consent agreement of February 13, 1906: It is agreed by unanimous consent that on to-morrow, Tuesday, February 20, at 3 o'clock p. m., and on Wednesday, February 21, immediately upon the conclusion of the routine morning business, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the bill S. 88 "for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes;" that debate shall proceed under the ten-minute rule; that for this purpose the unfinished business shall be temporarily laid aside on Wednesday; and that at 5 o'clock on said day (Wednesday, February 21, 1906) the Senate will begin voting without further debate upon the amendments pending or then to be offered, and will vote upon the bill itself before adjournment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will inquire of the Senator from Iowa if he did not intend to include the amendments in the portion of the unanimous-consent rule he offered, when he proposes that the Senate shall proceed with the consideration of the bill. It should be "the bill and amendments." It is the amendments, I understand, that are to be considered under the ten-minute rule.

Mr. ALLISON. The bill and amendments. I do not object to that, of course. We can not consider the bill without considering the amendments that are offered.

Mr. HEYBURN. What I want to get at is, Does the Senator intend that only the bill itself shall be proceeded with under the ten-minute rule?

Mr. ALLISON. Well, the bill——

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator's suggestion this morning was that the amendments should be considered.

Mr. ALLISON. I think you would eliminate the ten-minute rule if you should discuss the bill without considering amendments. I think it is necessary now that at 3 o'clock to-morrow the debate shall be confined to the amendments.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is what I understood this morning.

Mr. ALLISON. Therefore I provide for general discussion of the bill between the conclusion of the morning business and 3 o'clock.

Mr. HEYBURN. I wish to make a suggestion. As I understand the proposed agreement, in proceeding under the ten-minute rule those having charge of the bill would only be permitted to speak ten minutes on the bill itself. That is all right as to amendments. Ten minutes is quite sufficient time, I think, on each amendment, but as to the bill itself, those having charge of it would perhaps want to occupy more than ten minutes.

Mr. ALLISON. If the Senator desires to occupy more than ten minutes he will have no trouble in doing so.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not know that those having the bill in charge would want more than ten minutes to reply to any attack that might be made upon it, but this is different from the proposition made this morning.

Mr. ALLISON. The Senator will see that I provide for general debate until 3 o'clock to-morrow and that after 3 o'clock the debate shall continue under the ten-minute rule, and that continues during Wednesday. It is in lieu of the former agreement, which would have required us to begin voting on Wednesday immediately after the conclusion of the morning business.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am in entire sympathy with the proposed rule except I want to be protected in having time enough to answer such attacks as may be made on us.

Mr. ALLISON. I should think between the morning hour to-morrow and 3 o'clock would be time enough.

Mr. HEYBURN. But it is difficult to tell what will be done after that in the way of attack on the bill.

Mr. LODGE. Nobody can speak more than ten minutes after 3 o'clock.

Mr. HEYBURN. I may not be able to speak at all. I should like to have the opportunity to meet such an attack as may be made upon the bill. I might want to reply to it; that is the idea.

Mr. HOPKINS. I suggest to the Senator to make an additional request that he be given twenty minutes to reply.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator need not be afraid of anything unfair.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am not afraid of anything unfair; only circumstances might arise.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. I have no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am advised that the copies of the bill are exhausted, and I would ask unanimous consent that, say, 250 copies be printed.

Mr. KEAN. Let us have a reprint with the amendments agreed to printed in italics.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the amendments offered printed in brackets.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have no objection.

Mr. KEAN. Then we can readily understand what the bill really is or what it is proposed to make it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho asks that 250 copies of the bill, with the pending amendments in brackets, be printed——

Mr. KEAN. With the amendments that have been agreed to in italics and the amendments that have been offered in brackets.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. With the amendments offered in brackets, and the amendments already agreed to in italics. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. GALLINGER. I offer certain amendments which I ask may be printed and lie on the table.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments will be printed and lie on the table.

LIGHT VESSEL OFF NANTUCKET SHOALS, MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent to call up the bill (S. 4016) for establishing a light vessel off Nantucket Shoals, Massachusetts. It will take only a moment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and by unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 3, before the word "thousand," to insert "and thirty;" so as to make the bill read

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $130,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of constructing, equipping, and outfitting complete for service a first-class light vessel, with steam fog signal, to take the place of light vessel No. 58, which foundered on December 11, 1905, while marking the station off Nantucket shoals, about 40 miles to the southward and eastward of Nantucket Island, Massachusetts, and the Light-House Board is authorized to employ temporarily at Washington three draftsmen, to be paid at current rates, to prepare the plans for said vessel when this appropriation is made and to be paid therefrom, such employment to cease on or before the date when, the plans for such vessel being finished, proposals for building it are invited by advertisement.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, February 20, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS.

Executive nominations received by the Senate February 19, 1906.

SURVEYOR OF CUSTOMS.

William C. Kennedy, of Ohio, to be surveyor of customs for the port of Columbus, in the State of Ohio, to succeed Elmer J. Miller, whose term of office has expired by limitation.

PROMOTION IN THE NAVY.

Commander Joseph B. Murdock to be a captain in the Navy from the 22d day of January, 1906, vice Capt. Henry N. Manney, retired.

APPOINTMENT IN THE ARMY.

Maj. William P. Duvall, Artillery Corps, to be brigadier-general, vice Reed, to be retired from active service.

PROMOTIONS IN THE ARMY.

Maj. Alexander B. Dyer, Artillery Corps, to be lieutenant-colonel from February 16, 1906, vice Birkhimer, appointed brigadier-general.

Capt. Charles H. Hunter, Artillery Corps, to be major from February 16, 1906, vice Dyer, promoted.

First Lieut. John W. Gulick, Artillery Corps, to be captain from February 16, 1906, vice Hunter, promoted.

Second Lieut. William Tidball, Artillery Corps, to be first lieutenant from February 16, 1906, vice Gulick, promoted.

POSTMASTERS.

ALABAMA.

John B. Daughtry to be postmaster at Hartford, in the county of Geneva and State of Alabama. Office became Presidential October 1, 1905.

Andrew M. Steele to be postmaster at Tuscumbia, in the county of Colbert and State of Alabama, in place of Robert Cloud. Incumbent's commission expires March 14, 1906.

Archibald C. Walter to be postmaster at Union Springs, in the county of Bullock and State of Alabama, in place of Henry Harris. Incumbent's commission expired January 20, 1906.

ARKANSAS.

David F. Taylor to be postmaster at Osceola, in the county of Mississippi and State of Arkansas, in place of David F. Taylor. Incumbent's commission expired January 16, 1906.

CALIFORNIA.

C. F. Demsey to be postmaster at Mojave, in the county of Kern and State of California, in place of William Collins, resigned.

Joseph P. Frankhouse to be postmaster at San Fernando, in the county of Los Angeles and State of California, in place of Edmund L. Brown, resigned.

Hiram L. Tripp to be postmaster at Santa Rosa, in the county of Sonoma and State of California, in place of Allen B. Lemmon. Incumbent's commission expires February 28, 1906.

GEORGIA.

Charles W. Moxley to be postmaster at Wadley, in the county of Jefferson and State of Georgia. Office became Presidential January 1, 1906.

Charles I. Robinson to be postmaster at Eatonton, in the county of Putnam and State of Georgia, in place of Charles I. Robinson. Incumbent's commission expired February 7, 1906.

ILLINOIS.

James W. Breen to be postmaster at Manteno, in the county of Kankakee and State of Illinois, in place of James W. Breen. Incumbent's commission expired December 12, 1905.

Lewis A. Castle to be postmaster at Wyoming, in the county of Stark and State of Illinois, in place of Lewis A. Castle. Incumbent's commission expires March 5, 1906.

Frank H. Greene to be postmaster at Genesco, in the county of Henry and State of Illinois, in place of Frank H. Greene. Incumbent's commission expired February 13, 1906.

Fred C. Kile to be postmaster at Blue Island, in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, in place of Fred C. Kile. Incumbent's commission expired February 10, 1906.

William J. McEldowney to be postmaster at Chicago Heights, in the county of Cook and State of Illinois, in place of William J. McEldowney. Incumbent's commission expired February 10, 1906.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 19, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of Thursday, February 15, 1906, was read and approved.

INDUSTRIAL ARTS AND EXPOSITIONS.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions may sit during the sessions of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MAYNARD] asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Industrial Arts and Expositions may sit during the sessions of the House. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Is there anything for that committee to do?

Mr. MAYNARD. They are having a hearing.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

VESSELS AT CERTAIN CALIFORNIA PORTS.

Mr. NEEDHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 3318) to allow the entry and clearance of vessels at San Luis Obispo, Port Harford, and Monterey, Cal.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the collector of customs at San Francisco is hereby authorized to depute an officer of the customs from his collection district to proceed to San Luis Obispo, Port Harford, or Monterey, in his district, for the purpose of receiving at those places the entries of vessels arriving there in ballast and of clearing them with cargoes of petroleum only in the same manner as if they had proceeded to San Francisco before entry. The actual necessary expenses of the officer shall be paid by the private persons concerned.

With the following amendment:

In line 8, page 1, after the word "petroleum," insert "and its products." Strike out all after entry in line 1, page 2.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. NEEDHAM, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BOUNDARY LINES BETWEEN OKLAHOMA AND NEW MEXICO AND THE STATE OF TEXAS.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 443) to authorize the President of the United States, in conjunction with the State of Texas, to run and mark the boundary lines between the Territories of Oklahoma and New Mexico and the State of Texas.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill, which the Clerk will report.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas the west boundary of the Panhandle of Texas and the east boundary line of New Mexico is fixed by law on the one hundred and third meridian and said line is 310 miles long; and

Whereas only 70 miles at the south end and 184 miles at the north end of said line were surveyed and marked with monuments (in the year 1859, by John H. Clark, the commissioner on the part of the United States); and

Whereas the remainder of said line, 56 miles in length, has never been run or marked on the ground; and

Whereas it is necessary that said lines be re-marked on the ground, and the 56 miles not marked be established; and

Whereas said Clark survey was made under a joint commission by the United States and the State of Texas, authorized by act of Congress approved June 5, 1858, and said survey has been approved by the United States and the legislature of the State of Texas, and conformed to by the surveyors of the State of Texas; and

Whereas a part of the south and east lines of New Mexico bordering on Texas, and all that part of the boundary line of the Texas Panhandle now bordering on Oklahoma, as run by said Clark, can not now be found and identified; and

Whereas Congress, by act approved January 15, 1901, provided for fixing a monument on Red River at the intersection of the true one hundredth meridian with said river; and

Whereas said monument has been duly fixed under said law by Arthur D. Kidder, United States examiner of surveys, and a report thereon made, in House Document No. 33, Fifty-seventh Congress, second session, and in Bulletin No. 194, Series F, of the Geological Survey, by Marcus Baker, on the northwest boundary of Texas; and

Whereas the fixing of the said Kidder monument on the one hundredth meridian properly marks that boundary, the same having been fixed under said act of January 15, 1901, and the fixing of said monument and meridian requires the resurvey of said lines between Texas and Oklahoma; and

Whereas that part of said Clark line not now known and established should be fixed on the ground by monuments erected along said line, and that part not now known should be resurveyed, established, and marked: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to appoint a commissioner, who, in conjunction with such commissioner as may be appointed by and on behalf of the State of Texas for the same purpose, shall run and mark the boundary between the Territories of Oklahoma and New Mexico and the State of Texas. Beginning at the point where the one hundredth degree of longitude west from Greenwich crosses Red River, and running thence north to the point where said one hundredth degree of longitude intersects the parallel of 36° 30′, north latitude, as determined by John H. Clark, the commissioner on the part of the United States, in the year 1859; thence west along said parallel, as marked by said Clark, to the point where it intersects the one hundred and third degree of longitude west from Greenwich, as determined by said Clark, and thence south with the said one hundred and third degree of longitude to the thirty-second parallel of north latitude; and thence west with the thirty-second degree of north latitude, as determined by said Clark, to the Rio Grande River.

SEC. 2. That the monument established (under authority of the act of Congress approved January 15, 1901) by Arthur D. Kidder, United States examiner of surveys, at the point of intersection of the true one hundredth meridian with Red River shall be accepted as correct, and shall be the beginning point of said survey of said line on Red River, and such other corners shall be established and landmarks erected along said boundary lines as may be agreed upon by the United States commissioner, acting by his authority, and the State of Texas commissioner, acting under his authority: Provided, That the part of the line run and marked by monuments along the thirty-second parallel of north latitude and that part of the line marked by monuments along the one hundred and third degree of longitude west of Greenwich, the same being the east-and-west and north-and-south lines between Texas and New Mexico, and run by authority of act of Congress approved June 5, 1858, and known as the Clark lines, and that part of the line along the parallel of 36° 30′ of north latitude, forming the north boundary line of the Panhandle of Texas, and which said parts of said lines have been confirmed by acts of Congress of March 3, 1891, shall remain the true boundary lines of Texas and said Territories of Oklahoma and New Mexico: Provided further, That it shall be the duty of the commissioners appointed under this act to re-mark said old lines where they can be found and identified by the original monuments, now found on the ground, or where monuments are now missing, but their original position can be shown by competent parol evidence, or by the topographical maps, or field notes made by said Clark; the monuments so found, or their position so identified, shall determine the true position and course of the boundary lines as marked by said Clark to the full extent of the survey made by him; and where no survey was actually originally made on said lines, it shall be the duty of the said commissioners to run a straight line between the nearest points determined by the Clark survey, and when said straight lines have been so run, marked, and agreed upon by the commissioners, they shall thereafter form the true boundary lines.

SEC. 3. That the sum of $50,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to carry out the provisions of this act: Provided, That the person or persons appointed and employed on the part and behalf of Texas are to be paid by the said State: Provided further, That no persons except a superintendent or commissioner shall be appointed or employed in this service by the United States but such as are required to make the necessary observations and surveys to ascertain such line and erect suitable monuments thereon and make return of the same.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Reserving the right to object, I should like to have the object of this bill explained.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I desire to state to the gentleman from New York that in 1859 there was a joint commission on the part of the State of Texas and the United States appointed to run the boundary line between Texas and New Mexico. The President of the United States appointed one John H. Clark as a commissioner. Mr. Clark met the Texas commissioner, who was William Scurry, and they proceeded to run the boundary lines, beginning on the Rio Grande River a few miles above El Paso and on the thirty-second parallel of latitude. From this point the commissioners ran east to the southeast corner of New Mexico. They there established by astronomical calculations the southeast corner of New Mexico, at a point that they supposed to be the point of intersection of the thirty-second parallel with the one hundred and third meridian. From this point they run north across the Staked Plains, for the purpose of running the one hundred and third meridian, which is the boundary line between Texas and New Mexico. They proceeded 30 or 40 miles; when, on account of that year being a very dry year, they were unable to pursue the line in that direction. They then went back to the Pecos River and traveled up the river to a point opposite the northwest corner of Texas, which point is on the one hundred and third meridian. They there established astronomically the northwest corner of Texas in the east boundary line of New Mexico. They then ran south something over 120 miles along the one hundred and third meridian as located astronomically by Clark, when they were again stopped on account of the droughty season and not being able to cross the plains on account of the lack of water—that country being uninhabited at that early date.

The commissioner, John H. Clark, reported his work fully to Congress, which report was afterwards approved and adopted by act of Congress. The fact is that 59 miles had not been run or marked. Recently, in 1892, Congress passed an act ratifying the line as run by John H. Clark, and there was also an act of the Texas legislature approving the same line passed the same year. These acts absolutely and forever fix this boundary line as the true line between Texas and New Mexico, and all that now remains to be done by this bill is to re-mark the old line as run originally by Clark and to connect the part of the line not run by a straight line and to mark this straight line.

In recent years, since the counties along that line have been settled up and organized, it has been ascertained that the two lines, if protracted, will not meet, and that the astronomical calculations were not correct, the line being located a mile or more too far west; but this old line thus run and marked by Clark has been approved by Congress and the State of Texas. This bill provides that the line shall remain as approved and as run originally and marked by the monuments found now on the ground, and that this 59 miles shall be run by a straight line between the monuments that can be found on the ground, and that these lines and monuments so marked shall constitute the true boundary line between Texas and New Mexico.

The trouble arose originally on account of the conditions of the country in 1858 and 1859, it being a wild country and no water being found on the plains at the point the lines did not meet. Mr. Clark believed that these two lines, if prolonged, would meet each other; but recently, as I have stated, the surveyors on the part of Texas and the United States have ascertained that there is a hiatus there, and that if the lines are prolonged they will not meet; hence this must be corrected by this bill. The legislature of the State of Texas has passed a bill for the same purpose. There is a comprehensive report made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. BIRDSALL] in its favor. There is no objection to the bill that I am aware of. The United States sent out Mr. Arthur D. Kidder last year—he is a special examiner of surveys—and he made a full and excellent report on this boundary question. I have that report here, and also the report made by Mr. BIRDSALL, from the Judiciary Committee, in favor of the bill. It was an unanimous report from that committee.

Mr. MANN. May I ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. So far as this bill relates to John H. Clark, it confirms that survey?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. MANN. I think that is right.

Mr. LACEY. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman from Texas will remember a long litigation between the United States and Texas, which finally resulted in the establishment of Greer County, Okla.?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LACEY. Does this bill affect the boundary line along Greer County touching the State of Texas?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It does not, only in this way: Mr. Kidder established the one-hundredth meridian and the west boundary line of Greer County is the one-hundredth meridian——

Mr. LACEY. How much is there in controversy at the one-hundredth meridian?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Very little, and Texas gains as much as she loses. Originally there was a mistake made as to the location of the one-hundredth meridian on Red River.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman will remember—was he in Congress at the time the Greer County bill was passed? It was in the latter part of Cleveland's Administration. Judge Brown, of the gentleman's district, came here and in collaboration with him and Attorney-General Harmon I was designated to help draw the bill to settle the difficulties of the situation between Greer County and the State of Texas. There were a large number of settlers along the line, along this boundary which the gentleman now speaks of, that had bought lands from the State of Texas at $2 an acre. In the Greer County bill a new arrangement was made by which the rights of these Texans, purchasers from the State of Texas, were ratified to a certain extent, and only to a certain extent. They were given the homes they had bought of Texas at $2 an acre; they had bought land in large tracts under certain provisions, and this area was reduced. Now, it occurs to me that perhaps some of these tracts of land that have been adjudicated upon in the Greer County bill are along the boundary line, and the passage of this bill would transfer some of these purchasers back into Texas and give rise to another controversy. I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not that ought not to be provided for—that the rights of the settlers who have been holding land under the Greer County act should not be affected in any way by any further change of boundary. I will ask the gentleman if he has investigated that matter to find out whether the rights of these individuals will be affected?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state to the gentleman that the State of Texas in that part of the State has never patented any land and that all that land is public land.

Mr. LACEY. The gentleman misunderstands my question. The State of Texas never had patented any of this land, but it sold it on long time at $2 an acre at a very low rate of interest. Since that time many of these people have obtained patents from the United States.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state to the gentleman from Iowa that there is no trouble along that line between the citizens of Greer County and the citizens of Texas. They have all agreed upon this matter and want the line run and marked plainly along the one hundredth meridian. There is but a short distance between the old line and the new line, and after running north quite a distance from Red River the line established by Mr. Kidder as the one hundredth meridian crosses the supposed line between Texas and Oklahoma; and Mr. Kidder established the line—if I can get the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY]—under act of Congress passed in 1891. I believe the gentleman from Iowa also took some interest in that bill, and when it passed Congress it provided fully for settling the differences between the United States and Texas, and also definitely located the one hundredth meridian by the definite location by Mr. Kidder, the United States surveyor, of the one hundredth meridian. Texas is willing to accept the work done by the United States under that bill.

Mr. LACEY. I would like to ask the gentleman one further question. Has he conferred with the Delegate from the Territory of New Mexico, which would also be affected by this bill?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I think Mr. Rodey understood the bill thoroughly, but I do not think that Mr. ANDREWS, the present Delegate, does understand it.

Mr. LACEY. I refer to the present Delegate.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That was last year that I talked to Mr. Rodey about it, and I have given personally to Mr. ANDREWS, the gentleman representing that Territory, a copy of the bill. It is a very hard bill to understand, but I am persuaded that if he has read and fully understands the bill that he would have no objection to it. I have a recent letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office stating that they have not made any surveys east of the old Clark line, and that none will be made east of the old Clark line until the matter is definitely settled.

Mr. SHEPPARD. May I ask the gentleman if this bill affects the boundary line between the Indian Territory and Texas?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Not this bill. There is a bill pending, introduced by Mr. SHERMAN, of New York, that does settle the boundary line between the Indian Territory and Texas. The two bills might be combined and put upon this bill. This bill might properly be amended by adding that bill to it so as to have one bill and one commission for settling both boundaries.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Is there any question involved in the proper line between the Indian Territory and Texas?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I understand there are probably only two or three places along Red River where there would be any controversy about that boundary, but that matter is in another bill. There is no controversy as far as that is concerned in this bill.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, at the suggestion of the Delegate from New Mexico, I object to this bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

UNITED STATES COURTS, ALBANY, GA.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11501) to amend an act to provide for circuit and district courts of the United States at Albany, Ga.

Be it enacted, etc., That the word "southwestern," wherever it appears in said act be stricken out, and the word "Albany" be inserted in lieu thereof.

SEC. 2. That the counties of Tift, Turner, and Crisp be assigned to said division of the southern district of Georgia.

SEC. 3. That the county of Colquitt, now in the southwestern division of the southern district of Georgia, be detached from said southwestern division and attached to the Albany division of said district.

SEC. 4. That the county of Miller, now in the northern district of Georgia, be detached from said district and attached to the Albany division of the southern district of Georgia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, was not a bill passed on this subject a short time ago?

Mr. GRIGGS. I will say, in answer to the gentleman from New York, that this division of courts was established a year ago, and this bill merely provides for adding certain other counties to the bill and a change of name of the division, because there happens to be in the southern district of Georgia another division of the same name.

Mr. PAYNE. Does that render necessary any other courthouse?

Mr. CLAYTON. Why, no, sir; the division is already established.

Mr. PAYNE. The court was established in the former act?

Mr. CLAYTON. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. GRIGGS, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12320) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

TO PROHIBIT GAMBLING IN THE TERRITORIES.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and put the bill (H. R. 10858) to prohibit gambling in the Territories on its passage, and ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine, by the direction of the Committee on the Judiciary, moves to suspend the rules and pass the following bill.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill. Does the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] move to suspend the rules and pass the bill without the amendments reported or with the amendments reported?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. With the amendments reported by the committee.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill as amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That any person in any of the Territories of the United States who deals, plays, or carries on, opens, or causes to be opened, or conducts, either as owner or employee, whether for hire or not, any game of faro, monte, roulette, lansquenet, rouge et noire, rondo, tan, fan tan, poker, seven and a half, twenty-one, chuck-a-luck, or any banking or percentage game, or any other kind of a game played with cards, dice, or any device, for money, checks, credit, or any other representative of value, is guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000 and by imprisonment for not more than one year, or either.

SEC. 2. That this act shall take effect within sixty days after its passage.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman one question——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD] has twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] has twenty minutes in opposition.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I wanted to ask, as I could not hear when the bill was read, very clearly, whether it applies to the District of Columbia as well as the Territories?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; it does not.

Mr. KEIFER. Why not?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. For this reason: The District of Columbia already has legislation on this subject, and the Territories have legislation which simply authorizes the licensing of gambling. The District of Columbia has no such legislation.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman will pardon me still further——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I can not point the gentleman to the chapter and section, but then there is legislation, as I understand it, prohibiting gambling in the District of Columbia.

Mr. KEIFER. There is also legislation, as I understand, in the Territories, and that is the usual way of regulating the Territories, is it not?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No. The legislation in the Territories——

Mr. KEIFER. I wanted to ask a further question: Whether it is not unusual to pass such legislation as applicable to the Territories directly? I do not deny the power of Congress to do it, although it is denied by a great many. Does the gentleman know of any such legislation?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will say to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio that I can not now point him to any specific section of the statutes which involves exactly a proposition like this—that is, which is parallel with it from a legal standpoint. The situation is simply this with reference to the Territories: The Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, instead of having legislation prohibiting gambling, now have legislation that simply licenses gambling. We have here, of course, under the act organizing those two Territories, supervisory control over that legislation. The legislation that they enact obtains and is in full force, subject to our approval. If we do not object, it continues to be the law. Indirectly, under the circumstances, the Congress is responsible for the existence of the legislation in the two Territories that licenses gambling. I do not know that there is anyone coming from the Territory, or who is interested therein, that disagrees as to the propriety of this legislation on the whole. Now, I would like to answer any further questions the gentleman may have to ask.

Mr. KEIFER. The question I want to get at is whether we are going to open a new line of legislation for the Territories and intermingle our legislation with the State legislation? Suppose the Territories legislate on this subject, or have already legislated on it, is this to override it?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly. The Territories have already legislated on this subject by licensing gambling. Now, then, the proposition for us is, Do we, having the supervision of the legislation in the Territories, desire to stand for a legislative proposition that licenses gambling houses in New Mexico and Arizona and other Territories so far as they have such legislation?

Mr. KEIFER. I do not know, and the gentleman does not seem to be able to say, that there has ever been such legislation. Long ago, in the Florida case, Congress passed a number of bills annulling Territorial legislation. But have they undertaken to say that the legislature should not legislate further on that subject and undertake to furnish the laws, as this will, for the Territories? It makes the legislation of Congress for the Territory.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It does not conflict at all—that is, we legislated upon polygamy in Utah and absolutely prohibited it against the will of the people living in Utah, and we have done it in several other Territories in virtually the same way.

Mr. KEIFER. Well, if this legislation be in conflict with the Territorial legislation, does not the law that you thus enact take the place of the Territorial legislation?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly; and it ought to.

Mr. KEIFER. Then why not say so in the bill?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The bill simply prohibits it, and that wipes out the license absolutely.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment? I beg to call the attention of the House—while not committing myself to this particular legislation—to the fact that we have passed a bill prohibiting prize fighting in the Territories, especially aimed at Arizona, where they were about to have one; and, furthermore, we prohibited the circulation of newspapers advertising prize fighting in the Territories.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. That was legislation on the part of Congress; so that the gentleman from Ohio has called my attention to a precedent right in line.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him this question?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you think, as a matter of fact, that by this legislation you can prohibit gambling in the Territories; or, if you can not, is it not better to control it, as it is controlled to-day, than to attempt to prohibit it and fail to control?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. After the gentlemen who oppose this measure suggest whatever they have in connection with it, I will have read from the desk correspondence from the Territory—there are a number of letters on the subject, and part of them in the report—in which those people ask for this legislation. The information comes entirely unsolicited, both from Arizona and New Mexico, and for that reason I believe that the legislation is necessary and important. They can not get it from their legislatures; they have not been able to get it. I have here on my desk a newspaper received this morning, showing where a town undertook to prohibit gambling, and they could not do so. If this bill is passed, the effect will be to apply it to all places in Arizona and New Mexico, and put them on a par with the balance of this country in reference to legislation in connection with gambling. I do not know that this license is given anywhere else.

Mr. TAWNEY. I want to say this to the gentleman from Maine, without reference to the merits of the proposition—for I will not oppose his bill—that at the present time the effect of the law authorizing the licensing of places of this kind has been to give to the people of these Territories absolute control over gambling, and whatever places of that kind are conducted are conducted openly and orderly. The best evidence of that is the fact that in the city of Prescott, Ariz., where in one whole block, or one side of one block, there are several saloons in which gambling is conducted, and there are only two policemen to preserve order, and that, too, in a town of 8,000 inhabitants—one in the daytime and one at nighttime. Now, if you prohibit it entirely or attempt to prohibit it entirely, my judgment is that it will require four times or ten times that force of policemen to enforce the law prohibiting gambling, and then, even, you will fail to accomplish it. You will have gambling just the same, but not under the control that you have at the present time.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has thirteen minutes remaining.

Mr. CANDLER. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Not at present. I want to say frankly about this that I do not undertake to be personally advised about the conditions in those Territories, but I should think it would have something of the same sort of operation that it has elsewhere, and I will take about three minutes on the subject in reading from a letter that came entirely uninspired as to the condition in those Territories and as to the value the people there place on this legislation, and they know more about this than I do:

PHOENIX, ARIZ., January 22, 1906.

DEAR SIR: You will doubtless be somewhat surprised to receive a letter from me asking aid for the suppression of gambling in Arizona, but we need help, and I believe you can help us.

This is to one of my constituents.

Gambling is conducted here in the most "wide-open" manner possible and is licensed by the Territory. Its terrible results are manifest in almost every morning's paper—suicides, forgery, defalcations, murder—all the result of gambling. Young men from good eastern homes ruined, wives and families left destitute and hungry, all through gambling. You ask, Why don't we stop it? We have in several towns and cities, but the opportunity has been given us to wipe it out of all the Territories by the introduction, by Senator BURNHAM, of New Hampshire, and Hon. CHARLES E. LITTLEFIELD, of Maine, of bills in the Senate and House, respectively, abolishing gambling in all the Territories.

This is what we want, and I write to ask you to use your personal influence with any Member of Congress whom you may know to support and "push" this bill; and if there is anyone whom you can get to use their influence to this end, please do that. An immediate action will be greatly appreciated.

Sincerely, L. W. COGGINS.

Hon. GEORGE C. WING, Lewiston, Me.

That comes from a man of high character, who has been living in that Territory for some considerable time.

Now, with these suggestions I will reserve the balance of my time, and will then answer all the questions that may be propounded to me as well as I can.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has eleven minutes remaining, which he reserves.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I will yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER], who wishes to ask me a question.

Mr. CANDLER. What are the penalties prescribed in this bill?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The penalties are a fine of not more than $5,000 or imprisonment for not more than one year, entirely within the discretion of the court.

Mr. CANDLER. Fine and imprisonment both?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Or either. The court can impose a fine of $1, or one day's imprisonment, or either.

Mr. CANDLER. Up to $5,000 fine and how much imprisonment?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Not exceeding one year. Now, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has ten minutes remaining, which he reserves.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish it understood that I am here in any sympathy whatever with public gambling, or gambling of any kind, but I do protest against the gentleman from Maine, the farthest point in the United States from my home, coming in to handle our morals or domestic affairs for us, when, according to a statement made on this floor in the last Congress, in his own State—a prohibition State—there are 150 open saloons in the town of Bangor alone. It is prohibition that does not prohibit in his State; but he stretches out his phylacteries now to cover even the remote Southwest of the United States, and correct the morals there.

Mr. Speaker, there is no real pure and good motive—whatever may animate the breast of the gentleman from Maine—behind this bill. Congress insists on legislating for the Territories, and it has never put its hand on the Territory of Arizona that it has not done it injury. When you want a man who knows all about Indians, get him from the good old country about Massachusetts

Bay. If you want a man who knows all about the negro, get him from the same locality; and if you want another man who knows all about the Indians, go away down around the coast of Florida, where they have never seen an Indian.

Now, in my opinion, this bill is brought here under suspension of the rules, which prevents all amendments, for the simple purpose of getting votes in favor of joint statehood if the question shall be submitted to the people of Arizona. The purpose is to make it to the interest of the gambling fraternity to flee to the joint State with New Mexico, and thus avoid this act of Congress and take chances with the legislature of the new State.

The motive behind this bill is to lead all this vote and influence in favor of the miserable joint State bill in case the Forraker amendment passes Congress. Whether the gentleman from Maine has that purpose in mind or not I am not here to say, but I have no doubt in the world that that purpose is behind this bill.

Now, Mr. Speaker, Congress has legislated for the Territories several times. A recent Congress passed a bill legalizing the fraudulent Pima County railroad bonds in the Territory of Arizona without consulting the people of that Territory, and in that bill they put on my county alone nearly half a million dollars of indebtedness for a railroad that has not got a line as long as from here to the Speaker's desk. After the Supreme Court of the United States had declared those bonds absolutely void—void ab initio, and many of them never delivered—after the Supreme Court had decided in the case of Lewis v. The County of Pima that those bonds were absolutely fraudulent and void, Congress legalized them by its act and cost our county alone $400,000 at the least for a railroad, as I have said before, not as long as from here to the Speaker's desk and refuses thus far to give any redress whatever to Pima County.

Congress has legislated again and traded to the Government the denuded lands belonging to railroad companies in Arizona, giving the railroad companies scrip in return, for which they can locate better lands where they please. Congress took these lands, which had already been ruined, to make this blessed forest reserve in Coconino County, from which the timber had already been cut, and in order to make the reserve solid and homogeneous by uniting the railroad sections and the Government sections they gave scrip for the railroad lands and threw nearly all that county into a forest reserve, the result being to take from the county of Coconino alone, on which $175,000 of railroad bonded debt is also standing, the last particle of ground on which they could raise the tax to pay that imposition which Congress placed on that county.

Now, with all this experience before us, the gentleman from Maine rushes in at this hour to say that we shall here prohibit gambling in the Territory of Arizona. I want to say to him and to this House that no one man on this floor represents a constituency any higher in morals, any higher in education, any greater in everything that goes to make a great manhood in this country than the people of the Territory of Arizona; and yet we find the gentleman from Maine, after he gets a letter or so from very good men that denounces gambling in that Territory, rushing to give Congressional relief. The Territories should stop gambling, but I want them to stop it themselves. I protest against this everlasting meddling of Congress with the affairs of the people of the Territories. Gambling has been stopped in Tucson and can be stopped in the other cities whenever the people will to stop it, and I want it understood that my protest is not against the stopping of gambling, but my protest is against the gentleman from Maine acting as the legislature for the Territory of Arizona, when he confesses himself that he knows nothing about the conditions and knows nothing about the people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill ought to be amended, and I shall ask unanimous consent that I be permitted to insert in this bill, after the word "Territories," in line 3, the words "under the jurisdiction of the United States;" so that it will read that any person in any of the territory under the jurisdiction of the United States, etc. Let it apply to the Panama Zone, let it apply to Alaska, let it apply to the Philippines, let it apply to Porto Rico, let it apply to Washington City. The "Territories" means nothing in the world except——

Mr. PALMER. Let it apply to the District of Columbia.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes; my amendment would include it. I shall ask unanimous consent that that may be incorporated as an amendment in the bill just to test the bona fides of the promotors of this legislation.

I am not appearing in opposition to this bill, except as I have shown the underlying purpose of it. Arizona can take care of gambling and will do it in her own good time, and quickly. I am taking this occasion to call your attention to a common and reprehensible practice here. Gentlemen who know nothing about the Territories are doing and threatening through Congress more harm to the interests of its people than can possibly be conceived by them. Note the forest reserve effect on Coconino County and the railroad bond bill on Pima County. But to return to the purpose of this legislation, let me ask: Why have we heard the threat that Congress is going to tax the railroads of Arizona? Why do you now theaten that Congress is going to tax the mines of Arizona, except to use these threats as a club to hold over those people and attempt to drive them into an alliance with New Mexico, where they can handle the legislature just as easily as you charge the Territorial legislatures are controlled? That is the whole purpose of this bill. I protest, not against the apparent purpose of this bill, but against the source from which it comes—the Congress of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I have always opposed any action by Congress touching the Territories where the local legislature has power to act. I am still convinced of the wisdom of that position whether the act of Congress be well intended or not. It is wiser and safer to leave all local questions in the hands and under the direction and control of the people themselves. Morality does not come through statutes but through the exalting influence of an educated public opinion. If Congress assumes to pass good laws for the Territories where they have local self-government, they will likewise pass bad and sometimes ruinous laws. I repeat it is wiser and safer to leave all local matters in the hands of the people themselves than transfer them to a body like this, thousands of miles away from the environment, the conflicts and struggles of the parties most concerned. I have nothing more to say and yield back my time.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I would like to have the gentleman use the balance of his time.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I do not think I have anything more to say. I have not asked any of the other gentlemen here whether they desire to speak.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then all the time the gentleman desires to occupy has been occupied on that side?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I think so, as far as I know. It is as far as I am concerned.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman relinquishes the remainder of his time.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Then I have, if I am correct, twenty-one minutes?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has ten minutes.

Mr. KEIFER. May I ask the gentleman, does this bill apply to Alaska, the Philippines, and Porto Rico?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, I have different views as to the constitutional relation of the Philippines and Porto Rico to the United States from that the gentleman from Ohio has. From my point of view it does apply to all those Territories. Now, the courts might hold, possibly, that the Philippines and Porto Rico, while they were the property of the United States, are not now a part thereof and have not been made Territories.

Mr. KEIFER. But the Territories are——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I am answering the gentleman. I will not say whether it will apply to those or not, but it will apply to Alaska.

Mr. TAWNEY. On what theory does the gentleman contend it applies to Alaska?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Because it is a Territory, and we have legislated for it as a Territory.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is not so construed.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I say that is my opinion. The court has not so held; the court has not yet held that Alaska is a Territory of the United States.

Mr. TAWNEY. In order to remove any doubt, why not name them specifically?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. And in order to remove any doubt that the court has so held, if the gentleman will give the case where the court held Alaska was not a Territory, I will state——

Mr. SIBLEY. To resolve the doubt that might be in the mind as to how the court would construe the language of this bill, why not incorporate after the word "Territories" the words "including Porto Rico, the Philippines, and Alaska?"

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Well, I have no objection to that, but I want to say this: I want to say just one word in relation to the District of Columbia. As to the District of Columbia, the territory over which we legislate, there is now specific legislation prohibiting gambling in the District of Columbia. I do not know but what I might agree to an amendment for the purpose suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Now, whether I agree to an amendment suggested by my distinguished friend from Arizona may be another question. In connection with this legislation I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that after this bill was reported from the Judiciary I conferred with the distinguished Delegate from Arizona from time to time. Before I made a report on this bill I called his attention to the documentary evidence I had received from those Territories, and at his suggestion I left out one or two letters that I had received. I have endeavored to treat him up to date with perfect courtesy, but when he rises on his feet——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Will the gentleman permit an interruption there?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. What my friend says may leave an inference that he does not intend.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. What is it?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I left out a letter from L. C. Hughes, and that is the only one I suggested, and the reason of that I told you I thought it was too dirty for you to handle; not in its hypocritical statements, but on account of the man who wrote it. That he was utterly abandoned and unfit to be intruded on the decency of the House of Representatives.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Does that impeach my statement?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. The inference from your remarks is that I was leaving out letters that contained statements that I feared to have published to the world. This inference I deny.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. If the gentleman will possess his soul in patience just a minute and not be so disturbed——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. You seem to be disturbed.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Wait a minute and the gentleman will get a better apprehension of what I am stating. I said up to date I conferred with the distinguished gentleman from Arizona. I notified him this morning that I was going to call this up this morning for action. I have tried to treat him like a gentleman. In addition to that and in response to that the first thing he does when he rises on this floor is to meet me with a sneer as to the circumstances under which I introduced this legislation. Now, I do not propose to be swung aside in this debate for the purpose of discussing the prohibitory law in the State of Maine. The gentleman did repeat the customary sneer that I hear frequently on this floor, and he has no knowledge as to whether or not——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Now, my friend——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Do not interrupt me. I allowed the gentleman to go on with his diatribe.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. But I desire to make peace with the gentleman.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. No; do not interrupt me. I say the gentleman repeated what is a customary and usual sneer, and he knows as little about it as the average man does who undertakes to make the statement. I do not propose under these circumstances, when I am met with abuse from a gentleman that I have treated with courtesy and absolute frankness from beginning to end, to concede very much to what his wishes may be in connection with this legislation, especially in view of the fact that he stands up and says that this is for the purpose of affecting whom, if you please? Why, he says the gamblers down there in those two Territories are people who are very anxious not to have statehood. Now, why? They want to preserve a condition of legislation that they can control, and continue to license gambling—in what? In the States? No; but in the Territories that they now control and over whose destinies they exercise charge. Now, we are responsible for that condition. It was necessary once before, as stated by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] when prize fighters were going into Arizona for the purpose of conducting those fights that are so offensive to the average civilized person—not perhaps in Arizona but in other sections of our country—to prohibit it by an act of Congress, and now I have my friend, having treated him fairly, having been courteous, rising here to sneer at me and the attitude I have taken in connection with this question in the interests of whom?

Why, the people that want to continue to gamble in Arizona and in New Mexico. They want the privilege of controlling legislation in those Territories. Now, it is up to this House right now for every man in it to say whether he wants those Territories, having been now advertised by their Representative on this floor, to be allowed to continue to license gambling contrary to the moral sense of the people, not only in forty-five States, but, as I will show if I have the time to have it read from the desk, the moral sense of the intelligent people in those Territories this continuing to license gambling. We are responsible for the continuance of that condition. Mr. Speaker, how much more time have I?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has four minutes remaining.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, in that four minutes I want to send to the desk and have read a letter from a district attorney in New Mexico.

FEBRUARY 15, 1906.

HON. CHARLES E. LITTLEFIELD,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In regard to the antigambling law which you have introduced in Congress I wish to say that it is the best measure ever proposed by anyone for this country and that the respectable people of this section of the Territory are heartily in favor of it.

Though I have talked of it to many persons I have yet to find the man, who is not engaged in the business or running a saloon, who does not consider that it will be a godsend to the people of this country.

Open gambling is the greatest imaginable curse to a community. It is constant, insistent temptation, especially to the younger men and to the Mexican. It's simply got the Mexican on the run.

In this little town of less than 1,000 inhabitants there are five gambling houses running full blast, doing a land-office business—one gambling house for every 200 men, women, and children. The mere statement of that fact is enough to show what the business is doing for this country.

The people ought to be protected against themselves and especially the young fellows. When a young fellow comes to this country—and the greater proportion of the men who come are young—he naturally throws off restraint and does things that he would not think of doing at home, and he just naturally gravitates toward a gambling table. I have seen more fine young chaps ruined by gambling than I have by liquor in this country, and that is saying a whole lot.

The only argument I have heard even intimated against the measure is that it will raise the taxes, because a large part of the gaming licenses go to support the schools, and if Congress knocks out gambling the schools will have to—at least some of them—close. It was for this very reason that the revenue laws were so constructed in order to keep our legislatures from passing laws unfavorable to the gamblers. Things have certainly come to a sorry state when we have to depend on gamblers to rob our people of enough to educate the children. The same argument might be advanced with as good logic to justify houses of prostitution.

This is not a letter from a sky pilot at all. Personally I have no objections to a quiet little game, but I would gladly see the whole business of gambling knocked in the head, because I have seen what it does for the majority of men.

I am not writing this expecting it will have any effect either one way or another, but because when I see a man trying to do the right thing I believe in telling him so.

Yours, respectfully,

M. C. MECHEM.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Now, Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to the existing practical condition in Arizona under the legislation that now obtains there in connection with this question. The gentleman says that in his town they have undertaken to prohibit gambling. Now let me read something. This is a paper that I received this morning. I don't know but that this may be from a disreputable source, but this is the Jerome Morning News, and the gentleman did not intimate to me this morning that this was not a respectable paper. What does it say? "Judge Sloan decides that council can not prohibit gambling." That is, in that town the city council got together and undertook to wipe out that blot on civilization that exists in Arizona. It seems that it is necessary to keep it a Territory in order to enable it to continue to exist, if I get the information right from the distinguished gentleman who represents Arizona. Arizona a Territory and gambling licensed seems to be the proposition. Let me go a little bit farther——

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If my friend will permit me——

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I do not care to be interrupted by the distinguished gentleman.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. If the gentleman persists in this, he can make it as disagreeable for himself as he wishes.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Oh, heavens; I am likely to be terrified or even frightened!

Mr. SMITH of Arizona rose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Maine yield to the gentleman from Arizona?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield.

J. B. Hoover, who was arrested for running a game, is discharged, but it looks as if the end was not yet in sight.

Here is what Mr. Hoover says:

We will open all of the gambling games in the Fashion at 6 o'clock Saturday night.

Now, that is in Arizona. The News says, among other things:

The News believes, as it has from the start, that it would be better for all concerned if both sides would transfer the fight to the coming election, where it can be settled without trouble and expense, and to the perfect satisfaction of all concerned, and there is a great possibility, an almost certainty, that Congress will settle it for those concerned before even the 2d day of April comes to us.

Now, we have the simple, naked proposition, Mr. Speaker. Do we want to indorse a proposition for licensing gambling enterprises? If so, we will vote no; if we do not want to indorse it, we will vote yes.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, may I be recognized a moment?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has yielded his time.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for one minute only.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] asks unanimous consent to address the House for one minute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I am quite surprised at the attitude assumed by the gentleman from Maine [Mr. LITTLEFIELD], in fact, very much surprised at it. I do not want to say that in all of these years I have been misconstruing the character of the gentleman. In his absolute refusal, in his disdainful way, to submit to an interruption which I proposed to make as pleasant to him as I could he has disappointed my estimate of him. I had no idea of insulting him; I had no intention of doing it, and it seems to me if he was just about as careful of other people's opinions and would direct his conduct along the line of more decency to them, he would probably be not quite so sensitive of himself. Now, Mr. Speaker, I call this presence to witness that when he says that I rushed to the defense of the gamblers he makes a misstatement. I have said that I wanted to regulate it as much as he does. I repeated it the second time to prevent his making that statement, and I repeat it the third time. What I protested against was legislation from Congress in Territorial affairs, and disclosed the purpose of this bill in its effect on statehood. But I arose to explain the decision of Judge Sloan, which I understood from the paper account shown me was that he held that the charter of the town of Jerome gave no power to the municipality to regulate gambling or prohibit it, or that the ordinance was not passed pursuant to charter and was therefore void. The statement of the judge's decision, as quoted by the gentleman from Maine, was confessedly made to the press by the defendant in the case and may be inaccurate. However, I saw in an Arizona paper this morning that the judge decided in that case that the city did have power to prohibit public gambling, as attempted in the ordinance which was passed. But this is aside from the main question. Arizona can stop gambling and should manage her own affairs.

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill.

The question was taken, and (two-thirds voting for the motion) the rules were suspended and the bill was passed.

PERMANENT CENSUS OFFICE.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Census, I move to suspend the rules and pass the substitute for the bill (H. R. 12064) to amend section 7 of an act entitled "An act to provide for a permanent Census Office," approved March 6, 1902, which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves to suspend the rules and pass a substitute for the bill indicated. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 7 of the act entitled "An act to provide for a permanent Census Office," approved March 6, 1902, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 7. That after the completion and return of the enumeration and of the work upon the schedules relating to the products of agriculture and to manufacturing and mechanical establishments provided for in section 7 of the act of March 3, 1899, entitled 'An act to provide for taking the Twelfth and subsequent censuses,' the Director of the Census is hereby authorized decennially to collect statistics relating to the defective, dependent, and delinquent classes; to crime, including judicial statistics pertaining thereto, provided that such statistics shall include information upon the following questions, namely: Name, age, sex, color, race, nativity, parentage, literacy by race, color, nativity, and parentage, and such other questions relating to these subjects as the Director in his discretion may deem proper; to social statistics of cities; to public indebtedness, valuation, taxation, and expenditures; to religious bodies; to transportation by water, and express business; to mines, mining, quarries, and minerals, and the production and value thereof, including gold in divisions of placer and vein, and silver mines, and the number of men employed, the average daily wage, average working time, and aggregate earnings in the various branches and aforesaid divisions of the mining and quarrying industries; to life, fire, marine, casualty, and other insurance; to savings banks and other savings institutions, mortgage, loan, and investment companies, and similar institutions; to the fishing industry in cooperation with the Bureau of Fisheries; and every five years to collect statistics relating to street railways, electric light and power, telephone, and telegraph business. And the Director of the Census shall prepare schedules containing such interrogatories as shall, in his judgment, be best adapted to elicit the information required under the subjects, with such specifications, divisions, and particulars under each head as he shall deem necessary to that end; and all reports prepared under the provisions of this section shall be designated as 'Special Reports of the Census Office.' For the purpose of securing the statistics required by this section the Director of the Census may appoint special agents when necessary, and such special agents shall receive compensation as hereinafter provided. And the Director of the Census shall edit, index, and publish the Official Register of the United States, and the provisions of existing law imposing that duty upon the Department of the Interior are hereby repealed."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana moves to suspend the rules and pass the substitute for the bill, which substitute has just been reported. Is a second demanded?

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire if the gentleman is opposed to the bill?

Mr. HARDWICK. No.

Mr. MANN. I think that some one opposed to the bill is entitled to demand a second.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct about that. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] demand a second?

Mr. MANN. I demand a second.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] also to twenty minutes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, the bill now under consideration provides for the amendment of section 7 of the act creating the permanent Census Office. In addition to the duties imposed upon the Director of the Census by the original section, this bill authorizes five new inquiries, each of which is of great importance.

When the bill providing for the permanent Census Office was before the House for consideration much solicitude was expressed by gentlemen respecting the wisdom of the measure. It was feared that the expense of the Office would be altogether out of proportion to the benefits to be derived from it. There was a general impression among Members of the House that statistics gathered in connection with the decennial censuses were all that the interests of the country required, and the creation of a permanent Census Office was looked upon, at best, as only a doubtful experiment. The advocates of the measure are highly gratified over the result of the permanent Office. The Office now contains a number of expert statisticians and several hundred skilled and trained clerks, and its forces have been so arranged and its methods so organized that trustworthy and reliable statistics are gathered upon all important subjects, and reports thereof are made with the greatest possible facility. The country secures the benefit of census investigation and research before the data becomes obsolete and useless.

The work of the Census Office has come to be recognized as thoroughly trustworthy and reliable. The country is coming to appreciate more and more the high importance of a trustworthy center for reliable statistical information. Thousands and thousands of inquiries are addressed to the Office every year upon all the subjects covered by its various investigations and a great many subjects in addition.

The people of the United States are generally coming to appreciate more highly the importance of statistical information and its close relation to economic and sociological development. The real history of the people is contained in the statistics of its social and economic life, and their vital bearing upon true progress is no longer a question of doubt.

The Federal Government and the several States enact laws and establish elaborate and expensive machinery for their enforcement and administration, and it is highly necessary to know the actual operation of the laws and the effect of their administration upon the country, in order that improvements may be made in laws and policies with any degree of intelligence. Statistics, however, to be of any value at all must be reliable and trustworthy. Misinformation is worse than no information at all, and reliable statistics can only be gotten by trained statisticians under a systematic organization. The chief object of the permanent Census Office was to establish such an organization and to secure the highest possible degree of accuracy in its work. Another reason for its establishment was economy in the collection of statistics. It was designed to be the great statistical office of the Government, and under the act of its creation and under the law establishing the Department of Commerce and Labor, power was given the executive officers of the Government to consolidate the numerous statistical offices and divisions in the various Departments into the Census Office. A number of divisions and bureaus have been thus consolidated and needless duplication of investigation and reports has been avoided, saving hundreds of thousands of dollars a year to the Government and securing infinitely better results to the people.

Under the old plan a census was taken once in ten years, under the provisions of the Federal Constitution, chiefly for the purpose of apportioning Representatives and incidentally for the enlightenment of the world respecting the progress of the nation along certain lines. A temporary Census Office was created by law to do the special work at each decennial period. The Office usually contained a number of thousand clerks, was of necessity crude in its organization and methods, and its work was inaccurate and unscientifically arranged, so that the chief value of the statistical information obtained was lost for want of skilled statisticians and for the lack of scientific methods of investigation and compilation. Numerous special investigations were required with the general censuses and the work was of such an herculean character that the Office was unable to compile and make reports on many special subjects until the data contained in them had become practically valueless.

Since the Office has become a permanent institution special subjects that heretofore have been taken in connection with the decennial censuses have been investigated, and reports have been made with most gratifying results respecting quality and dispatch. It is the policy of the Office to make investigations of all the special subjects possible during the intercensal period, so that when the Thirteenth Census is to be taken only those general subjects that essentially belong to the decennial census will have to be investigated. The effect will be to greatly accelerate the work of the Thirteenth Census and to decrease its cost. I think it can be said with practical assurance that the expense of taking the Thirteenth Census, with an increased population of perhaps 20,000,000, will be as much below the cost of taking the Twelfth Census as to entirely offset the expense of maintaining the permanent Office during the period that the Office would otherwise have been discontinued.

The expense of making the inquiries and reports provided for in the pending bill will be comparatively small. No additional appropriation will be required and no additional clerks or agents will be necessary. The present clerical and field force of the Office will be able to handle all of the additional work imposed by the bill.

The bill provides, among other things, for the collection of judicial statistics of crime.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What kind of statistics?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Judicial statistics of crime; the records of courts throughout the country where crimes are punished.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. State and Federal?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. State and Federal.

The value of this investigation can not be overestimated. The expense of administering the criminal laws of the country is enormous, and yet nowhere can reliable information be obtained respecting the results of such administration. There is no source in this country where a seeker for information can go to ascertain the number of crimes committed, the character of the crimes, the number of convictions, the character of punishment, the period elapsing after indictment before trial, and numerous other matters that are of vital importance to a reformation and improvement of the criminal and penal laws of the country. There is no other country that makes any pretensions to a respectable standard of civilization that does not secure accurate statistics respecting the subject of crime and its punishment.

We devote much time and thought in this country to the making and enforcement of laws for the protection of life and property and the elevation of the morals of society, and yet we take no pains to ascertain with any degree of certainty the effect of such laws. We are able to determine the exact number of bushels of wheat produced in the country, the quantity consumed at home, and the number of bushels exported to foreign countries; we are provided with information respecting the exact number of tons of iron manufactured and of coal mined, but we are absolutely unable to know how many crimes have been committed, how many punishments have followed, and the character of the punishments that may have been imposed. In this connection I desire to read to the House a letter I received on the 14th instant from Hon. Andrew D. White, formerly president of Cornell University, United States ambassador to Germany, and chairman of the American delegation to The Hague peace conference. He says:

> I have for many years taken a deep interest in questions relating to crime in the United States, have collected much material on the subject, and have, from time to time, addressed various bodies upon it in this and other States. In my opinion there is no subject before the country at this moment really of such vital interest as this. I spare you the reasons for this opinion, but I hold it very tenaciously. Important as is the right solution of financial and commercial questions, they do not, by any means, cut so deep as does the question of the growth of crime and the right dealing with it in our country.
> Under these circumstances, I trust you will allow me to urge that the inquiry on this subject, for the purpose of the census, be made more thorough and practical. At present, strange as it may seem, the best source of information on this subject is not the census of the United States, but the statistical number of the Chicago Tribune, published every year on the 31st of December. For fifteen years past I have collected these statistics and used them, but I feel that, in the best interests of the country, we ought to have something more full, more perfect, and more authoritative. We should have not only the records of the courts as to felonies in which there are convictions, acquittals, or disagreements of juries, but also, from the sheriffs and other local officers, the complete records of crimes committed in each county, the authors of which remain undetected and unpunished. Only in this way can we understand the extent of the evil, and only upon this basis can we form any opinion as to the best methods of meeting this great evil.
> It is doubtless known to you, as to so many others, that the number of unpunished homicides is greater in our country than in any other civilized nation, save, possibly, Sicily and the lower parts of Italy, and that there is a looseness in dealings with high crime which is probably to be found nowhere else among nations which call themselves civilized.
> The reasons for this state of things undoubtedly run deep. They are connected unquestionably with the carelessness regarding human life, as shown by the statistics of our railways, and destruction of life by fire and other causes, as compared with what is to be seen in other countries. To me, as an American citizen, it has been mortifying and, indeed, exceedingly painful, to find, during extended residences in Russia, Germany, Italy, France, and England, that in every one of those countries precautions are taken and policies pursued, which seem vastly superior to our own, where safeguards to human life and property are concerned, whether from crime, greed, or carelessness. Allow me, then, dear sir, to urge most earnestly that the attention of your committee be called to this subject, in order that in future takings of the census we may have more of that exact knowledge on the subject of crime, which will be the only basis of intelligent action by the various States and by the nation on this most important subject.
> I remain, dear sir, most respectfully, yours,
> ANDREW D. WHITE.

And a letter from Amos W. Butler, of Indianapolis, Ind., secretary of the National Prison Association. He writes:

> My attention has been called to the fact that your committee has for consideration an amendment to the bill for a permanent census, providing for the question of judicial statistics. Such an amendment would be a very useful one. It will be helpful not only to individuals and charitable organizations, but to public officials who have to deal with the great problems of dependency, degeneracy, and delinquency. I shall be pleased, if you can see your way clear, to have you use your influence to secure the adoption of this amendment.
> Yours, very truly,
> A. W. BUTLER, Secretary.

Nothing in addition to the testimony of these eminent citizens need be said in support of this provision of the bill. Last winter Congress authorized the Director of the Census to collect statistics of marriage and divorce throughout the country. The gathering of this information will require the field force of the Census Office to inspect all the records of courts of general jurisdiction. This work will not be entered upon for a couple of months yet, and an investigation of judicial statistics of crime can be made by the same special agents in connection with the marriage and divorce investigation with practically no additional expense.

Another provision contained in the bill requires the Director of the Census to collect statistics of life, fire, marine, casualty, and other kinds of insurance. Insurance statistics were required in the Tenth and Eleventh Censuses, but the reports were made at so long a period after the investigation that they were of little or no practical value, and in order that the Twelfth decennial census might not be burdened with so many special subjects insurance statistics were omitted. In view of the vast importance of insurance in the affairs of the country and the new phases which various kinds of insurance have assumed in late years, the importance of this investigation can not be questioned. The results of recent investigations of leading life insurance companies has demonstrated to the several States the necessity of making more adequate provision for the protection of policy holders. Intelligent action can not be had along this line securing the best results without general statistical information respecting all kinds of insurance throughout the country. It would seem to be unnecessary to dwell upon the paramount importance of this particular subject. The statistics may be gotten in the main from insurance officers in the various States, where quite elaborate reports from the leading companies are required to be made annually.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman let me ask him this question: Would not this bill authorize some bureau merely to duplicate statistics already obtained in the different States?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. This bill does not contemplate a duplication, but a compilation, a collecting together in a single report, under proper arrangement, statistics collected by the several States upon the subject of insurance. There will be no duplication.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In every State these reports are now required. Does not the gentleman suppose that the Census Bureau will be able to get all the information from all these State reports?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Practically.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Now, is not the purpose merely to publish these State reports as Federal reports?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Not at all. It is the purpose of this bill to require the Director of the Census to collect and put into proper statistical form all the data contained in reports made to and by the several States so the country may have a central source of information upon this subject.

Mr. FITZGERALD. As a matter of fact are not statistical reports required by all these State insurance departments practically in this country—that is, every company doing business in more than one State must file reports in the different States in which it is doing business?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I am not prepared to give the gentleman an answer to that question. I understand there is great diversity of requirement in regard to this character of reports. One of the objects of this bill is to provide a single source of information, so that it will not be necessary to apply to the forty-five different States for insurance statistics.

While each State requires reports of all insurance companies doing business within their borders they have no statistical information upon the general subject of insurance throughout the country. One State, of course, may secure reports from the other forty-four States and at considerable expense and trouble coordinate and compile the various reports into valuable statistical form, but in order that each State may have the benefit of such information it would be required to make a general collection of statistics from all the other States at its own expense. The aggregate expense would be enormous. Instead of having forty-five independent statistical censuses of insurance, one by each State, this bill requires the Director of the Census to collect and compile all this information, so that it can be supplied to the various States and individuals who may be interested in it. The result will be to put the information contained in the offices of the various State insurance commissioners into systematic, intelligent, and compact form by a central office for the benefit of the people of the entire country.

Another subject of investigation contained in the bill is that of savings institutions, including savings banks, loan and investment companies, and similar institutions. No statistics of a general character are available upon this very important subject, and the value of this investigation is readily appreciated by its simple statement. The rapid increase of wealth in this country has given concern to the minds of many people, and the tendency toward the consolidation of wealth in the hands of a few is the subject of much solicitude. The accumulation of wealth, if it is equitably distributed among all classes of people, must be a national blessing, but it is highly important to know something about the distribution of the wealth of the country. While the result of an investigation of savings institutions will not be conclusive upon the subject, it will afford a great deal of valuable information respecting the effect of laws and policies and their bearing upon the national welfare of the people.

The bill provides that the Director of the Census shall, in cooperation with the Commission of Fish and Fisheries, collect and publish statistical information upon the subject of fisheries. It is believed that all the necessary data can be procured from the Fish Commission. The reports of that Commission are valuable, but they are of a commercial and industrial rather than of a scientific and statistical character. Fisheries is one of the important industries in this country, and general industrial statistics are not complete without including that subject. The data can be secured and the reports published with very little expense. The result will be of great benefit to the country in general.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask the gentleman from Indiana if the net result of this census work has not been that it has duplicated a whole lot of statistics of one sort and another?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, no; the net result of the work has been to obviate duplication.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Has it not been getting up the very same statistics that the Agricultural Department has been getting up?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Oh, no, indeed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One other question. If there was any reason for establishing this Bureau of Commerce and Labor, does not the work of this Census Bureau infringe on that domain?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It does not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One other question and then I will quit.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I desire to answer a question or two as we go along.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All right.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The Census Office is a Bureau in the Department of Commerce and Labor, and the Secretary of that Department has consolidated practically all of the statistical work in the Census Office. The purpose is to have one statistical office containing all the statistical information, as far as it is practicable. The Census Office does not duplicate any work in the Agricultural Department.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Were they not both getting up cotton statistics at once?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. No; the Agricultural Department procures estimates only, during the crop-growing season and during the ginning season, while the Census Office secures the exact results after the ginning has been done.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did we not refer this whole insurance matter to the Judiciary Committee, to find out whether it was any of our business at all?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Not the matter of statistics.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Wait a minute. They have not answered yet, have they?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I do not know; I think not.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If they make a report that we have nothing to do with insurance, and the House sustains that report, how does it come that we ought to be getting up these insurance statistics?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why, Mr. Speaker, if the statistical office of the Government only entered into fields that were proper subjects of national legislation, it would have very little to do.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is all it ought to enter into.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. All the Constitution requires in the way of collection of statistics is the decennial enumeration of the population for the purpose of apportioning Representatives and the imposition of direct taxes.

Another provision of the bill requires the Director of the Census to collect statistics of electrical industries once in five years. The law now requires such statistics to be collected and published once in ten years, but in view of the extraordinary development of electrical industries, statistics collected at such long intervals largely lose their value for purposes of comparison. The use of electricity for purposes of heat, light, and power have become extraordinary, and has revolutionized many lines of industry. In view of the rapid and almost sensational development of electrical industries, it is highly important to make these investigations at least once in five years. The law now requires general manufacturing statistics to be collected once in five years, and certainly the reasons for the collection of electrical statistics once in five years are fully as great as for the collection of manufacturing statistics generally that often. I quote a letter recently received by the Director of the Census from Thomas A. Edison upon the subject:

ORANGE, N. J., October 13, 1905.

I am in receipt of your letter, with copy of the final report on central stations, and thank you for remembering me. I have read the report with much interest and congratulate you upon the general excellence of the text and data. It is needless to tell you that I have referred with special interest to the chapters dealing with the invention and universal adoption of the incandescent lamp. Such reports as this are extremely valuable to all of us, but I think the figures would be even more useful if they could be obtained at more frequent intervals. Ten years in an electrical industry is equal to a lifetime in most others, and unless the figures are compared oftener than once in ten years they do not bear so close a relationship to each other as the specialist and the business man could desire. Please do not regard this as a criticism of a good piece of work thoroughly done.

With regards, yours, truly, THOMAS A. EDISON.

The opinion of so great an authority as Mr. Edison upon this question is well-nigh conclusive. The Government can afford to contribute the relatively small cost of collecting and publishing these statistics toward the promotion of electrical industries.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I notice here that they are to gather statistics covering transportation by water, and express business.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Let me explain to the gentleman. That provision is in the original law, and those statistics have already been obtained. I have been undertaking to explain to the House the few additions which this bill makes to the original law. The transportation question has already been disposed of.

Mr. SHERLEY. Whether it be in the present law or not, I want to inquire whether all of those statistics ought not now to be gathered by the Interstate Commerce Commission under the enlarged powers given them?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The enlarged powers have not yet been conferred on that Commission.

Mr. SHERLEY. Assuming that the legislation that has passed the House also passes the Senate.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My opinion is that it does not provide for the necessary statistical information. The facts collected by the Interstate Commerce Commission are purely for purposes of administration, and they are not such as are necessary for comparison in noting the progressive development of the industry.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does not the gentleman know that they now report statistical information in regard to transportation by land, and that they will that by water, and is not this a duplication?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I beg to be excused from a further discussion of that question, because it is not involved in the pending bill. I desire to use my time in explaining the new provisions.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD rose.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I will yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I gather that this information which is to be collected is for the next census?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. These are special investigations, and it is desired to get them out of the way so they will not be involved in the next general census.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Will the information be available to the public as soon as it is gathered, or will we have to wait until the next census is taken?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. It will be available as soon as it is gathered. That is the object in authorizing the statistics to be collected at this time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman answer this question? Why is it this change is made in editing and publishing the Official Register with regard to the census? Why not have it under the same authority where it is now established?

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The law now requires the Secretary of the Interior to edit, index, and publish the Official Register every two years. It provides that the register shall contain a full list of all officers, agents, clerks, and other employees connected with the legislative, executive, or judicial service of the Government, or paid by the United States Treasury, including military and naval officers, cadets, and midshipmen, giving the salary and compensation and emoluments of each, the State in which he was born and the Congressional district and county in which he was a resident at the time he was appointed to office. The law also requires that the register shall contain a list of ships and vessels belonging to the United States with certain special information as to each of them and a statement of all allowances made during the preceding two years to each contractor on contracts for carrying the mails. The compilation and publication of the Official Register is essentially statistical work and it naturally should belong to the statistical office of the Government. The work should be transferred from the Interior Department to the Census Bureau for this reason if there were no others, but at the request of the Civil Service Commission, the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, by an executive order, requires the Census Office to compile quadrennially and publish in the form of a bulletin full statistics of the classified service of the United States. In compiling this bulletin it is necessary to obtain practically all the information that is included in the Official Register, excepting that in relation to ships belonging to the United States and allowances to contractors for carrying the mails.

This bulletin is required by the Civil Service Commission in order that it may note the varying phases of the executive civil service. It is important for the Commission and the country to know the number of officers in the various branches of the Federal service, the date of their appointment, the length of time they have served, the progress they have made in respect to promotions, their age, sex, the relative number of each sex in various classes, and many other things. All this information is peculiarly valuable as bearing upon the efficiency of the present civil-service system and as suggesting modifications and reforms that may improve the service. This is the purpose for which the Civil Service Commission requires the statistics.

If the compilation and publication of the Official Register is transferred to the Census Office the work can be done in connection with the civil-service bulletin now required, and much unnecessary duplication of work and expense of publication can be saved. There is no reason from any standpoint for the continuation of the compilation and publication of the Official Register by the Department of the Interior. There are many reasons from an economic and statistical point of view for the transfer of that work to the Census Office. The Census Office can easily secure the information necessary as to ships and mailing contracts, required in the publication of the Official Register. This information can be gotten by the Census Office as cheaply and as reliably as it is now gotten by the Interior Department. The transfer of this work will save the expense of the quadrennial bulletin and at the same time will systematize statistical work and tend toward its consolidation in a single office. The work can be done without the employment of any additional clerks in the Census Office, and without much, if any, expense.

I have now explained to the House the provisions that are intended to be incorporated in the original law by the pending bill. They are all of great importance to the country and the work can be done and the reports published with an inconsequential expenditure of money. Within a year or two preparation must begin for the taking of the thirteenth general census, and it is desired to have all of the special investigations made and gotten out of the way before that work is entered upon, as far as it is practicable to do so.

The present force in the Census Office ought to be kept together for the purpose of taking the thirteenth census. It consists of expert statisticians and clerks especially trained along the line of statistical work. While it is not the purpose of this bill simply to provide work for the clerks in the Census Office, as the statistics are of great value and are worth more than they will cost, yet an incidental result will be to keep the present force intact and in shape to enter upon the taking of the thirteenth census so that the work may be done with higher efficiency and greater economy. The Census Office, since it has been made permanent, has been intelligently and systematically organized and efficiently administered. Its work has been of a very high grade and it is justly entitled to the commendation of all those who have an adequate appreciation of the value of trustworthy statistics in social and economic advancement. I trust that the bill will receive the support of the House.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the supreme courts of the States and United States have uniformly decided that insurance is not commerce, State or interstate. This being so, the Federal Government is without jurisdiction to compel insurance companies to disclose the condition of their business. Hence whatever data this Bureau might collect would be such as the companies might voluntarily give to the agent of the Census Bureau. It would be natural for these companies to give out only such facts as would make it appear they were in a perfectly solvent condition when the very opposite might be shown if the whole truth or all the facts were given out and made public. Not having the power, under these decisions, to compel the companies to disclose the status of their business, it is a serious question as to whether or not we should undertake to empower this Bureau to publish any of the facts, because, as stated, the companies might give out a glowing statement that would mislead the people—cause them to continue to insure with these companies, and thus be led into a state of false security and finally cause serious loss to the insured.

If Congress had the power to compel a full and complete disclosure, some benefit might follow, but it seems to me that to simply pass this measure, coupled with no power, to compel all the facts to be disclosed, is unwise legislation, however well meaning we may be in the passage of this measure. Is it not better for us to bear the ills we have than to flee to those we know not of? The States can legislate on this subject and compel full and complete disclosures, and I dare say that in the near future the States will take aggressive action in this respect to the end that all facts concerning the business of all insurance companies will be made known and published, and thus the people will be protected and not misled.

At an early day in this session the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], who now proposes this measure, insisted on the floor of this House that the question of insurance be referred to the Judiciary Committee to ascertain and report whether or not Congress had any power to control insurance, and this, too, because of the uniform decisions of the court that insurance is not commerce, and if not commerce Congress is without power to control insurance. And yet the gentleman reports this measure empowering the Census Bureau to investigate and report on insurance. Investigate how? By begging the insurance companies for facts concerning their business? Suppose they refuse to answer questions? Where is your power to compel them to answer? Clearly none under the existing law, but still some report will be made based upon some facts picked up here and there, which may not reach down to the bottom of the question and disclose the actual conditions of the company, and yet these facts will be printed in language not unfavorable to the companies, and thus the people would be misled. It does seem to me that this insurance provision at least is unwise, and is calculated to do great harm instead of good. We certainly should wait until the Judiciary Committee reports upon the powers of Congress to not only investigate and report on insurance, but on its powers to compel thorough investigations, that the whole truth may be known. For this reason I shall oppose including this insurance provision in this bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, if there is anyone in the House who could convince me that this bill is a proper measure to pass, it would be my distinguished friend from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], whose district adjoins mine at home; but I fear that he has been led away somewhat by the fact that he is chairman of the Committee on the Census and that the Census Office has reached a soft spot in his heart. This bill, while denominated a bill to amend the census laws, and while purporting to be a bill to gather statistics to be published for the benefit of the people, is in fact a bill to provide work for those now in the Census Office who otherwise would be fired from their jobs. The Census Office has completed, practically, the great decennial census of 1900. The employees have nothing to do. Now, what would occur in an ordinary business? Why, the force would be cut down. But, no, Mr. Speaker, not when the Government is engaged in the business. The way of the Government is not to discharge employees whose services are not longer needed, but to find something to keep them busy and make an excuse for paying them money. We have heard a great deal of talk recently about cutting down the enormous amount of printing done by the Government, and the other day in the newspapers there was something said about discharging somebody from the Printing Office because there would not be work enough to do. No, Mr. Speaker; people may be discharged from the Printing Office because the new Public Printer does not like the particular men or women under his employ, but no one will ever be discharged from a public office because he has nothing to do. That office will promptly come before Congress and make some excuse for further action. We have the Department of Labor, and every time it runs out of work it brings in a resolution in some way before Congress ordering it to do something else. We now have the Census Office, and every time it runs out of work and there is danger of the employees being discharged we will have some kind of a resolution or a bill providing for something else to be learned. Now, I have no doubt that it will be of great value to the religious people of the country to have the statistical branch of the Government—the Census Office—gather statistics in reference to religious societies, and yet every religious society keeps perfect statistics of its own. It publishes it own statistics; it is not needed, and if the statistics are gathered by the Government they may be biased in some way.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly I yield.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Allow me to make a suggestion. Religious statistics are already required by existing law. This law has nothing to do with it, and I think they have already been collected. I undertook to explain the three or four items in this bill that are new. Nearly all this bill is already the law. Religious statistics are required by the law making the Census Office a permanent institution.

Mr. MANN. Very likely. Then they will gather them again. Having gathered them once under this bill, they will proceed to regather them. It is not sufficient under this bill to gather the same statistics every ten years. It is every five years. If my friend the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] remains the chairman of that committee, as I hope he will if he is not promoted to a higher committee or a higher body, and the Census Office runs out of work, then they will want to gather statistics every two years or every six months. The point is not the gathering of statistics, but finding something for these employees to base a demand for pay on.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The enactment of this bill into law will not in anywise enforce the authority contained in the original law. If these statistics are to be collected again, it is because of the original law. We passed a law requiring certain statistics to be collected every ten years, and that law stands. This is a proposition to amend section 7 of that law in certain particulars only.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I am frank to say, Mr. Speaker, I am not entirely familiar with the statistics that are now gathered. I do not think anybody in the country pays much attention to the statistics coming from the Census Office except the matter of population. But the office is there. I was told early in this session of Congress—and I have no doubt other Members were, and for aught I know it was public property—that the Census Office either had to discharge a considerable portion of its employees or find authority from Congress to do something else. There is no legitimate employment in collecting decennial statistics, no occasion for the gathering of most of the statistics proposed here. A very large share of the gentleman's report is made up of communications from a former Member of this House, one Samuel J. Barrows, who has been engaged in various ways in criminology. I do not know whether the other distinguished man in Washington who has haunted the doorsteps of Members of the House and haunted the House itself upon the subject of criminology is also interested in the passage of this bill. Whenever somebody has a fad of some kind and an office of the Government wants authority to work, that person can get his fad ordered in the way of a resolution or bill passed through the House. For myself I believe that the Census Office has done the census work according to the present law—and I will say has done it well, exceeding well—and I can see no reason why we should make new work merely for the purpose of keeping these people employed.

While I dislike very much to disagree with the gentleman from Indiana, whom I have no doubt has better judgment upon this subject than I have, still I am not willing at any time to vote to have certain work done merely for the purpose of giving employment of somebody. We hear all the time about cutting down the publications of the Government, but that is all the Census Office is engaged in, practically, collecting information and publishing it. We hear a great deal from the other end of the Avenue and elsewhere about reducing the printing bills of the Government, and yet every proposition of this kind means an enormous increase in the public printing. For what? Not for the purpose of gathering statistics, but for the purpose of furnishing jobs. I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Seven minutes.

Mr. MANN. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is very frankly stated in the report from the committee. It is to keep the present force intact until the time comes to take the next census. The committee in its report says:

> At the same time your committee deems it proper to frankly inform the House that it is necessary to assign some additional work to the Census Office during the remaining brief interval preceding the Thirteenth Census if the present trained clerical force of the office is to be kept together, substantially intact, to assist in the work of the next decennial enumeration, in accordance with one of the purposes which actuated and justified Congress in establishing a permanent Census Office.

In other words, if this bill be not passed, there is nothing for the Census Office to do. Its work is done, and its employment of a large part of its force should cease. In order, however, not to finish up the work of the Bureau, but to keep this force employed, some ingenious gentleman has carefully scanned all the subjects which might possibly afford something for these employees to do and has compiled this bill, which will keep this force employed. Not only that, but provision is made for the employment of special agents, as provided in the original act. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER] stated that one of the purposes was to collect insurance statistics. Whoever is familiar with the methods by which the statistics of insurance companies are now compiled knows that this is an entirely unnecessary work. Every insurance company doing business in more than one State files in the different States practically the same reports, and it is possible to get from the insurance department of any State in the country information regarding the different insurance companies; but in order that these reports may be publishd as Federal documents—in order, I suppose, that they may be sent around through the country as frankable matter—it is suggested now that this Census Bureau obtain from the different State insurance departments the information collected there and publish them as Federal reports.

If the Census Bureau is to be of any value, there should be an end some time to its work. Its statistics should cover definite periods, and it should not be, by the means of such legislation as this, indefinitely carried along. It should not be necessary to seek work for the Bureau, but when its work is finished the Bureau should dispense with the services of those officials that are no longer required. There has been for some time a very strong effort made to establish under the Federal Government a department or bureau of criminology, and perhaps the provision in this bill authorizing the collection of statistics relating to "the defective, dependent, and delinquent classes, including statistical information appertaining thereto," and to do that every two years, may eventually provide the foundation for the establishment of this bureau of criminology. It seems to me that the work already done along the line indicated in this bill should suffice until the next session.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois has three minutes remaining.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I simply want to call the attention of the House to the fact that this is another provision, or proposed provision, of law for the purpose of increasing the inspection force that the Government is constantly employing, traveling through the country for the purpose of collecting statistics. And I want to call attention to another fact, that the Department of Commerce and Labor now has an estimate presented to Congress for an appropriation of $200,000 to be used in the collection of statistics concerning the employment of women throughout the United States, duplicating the work that the States are doing.

Now, I do not know where we are going to stop; but I do think it is time for Congress to commence to consider the extent to which we have already gone in the matter of the employment of special agents, inspectors, and collectors of statistics merely for the purpose of keeping people employed. That, according to the report of the committee here, is one of the primary objects of this bill. It is for the purpose of keeping a force of trained clerks employed pending the time that it becomes necessary for us to take the regular census of the United States. The departments are having considerable difficulty in continuing clerical force heretofore employed for this particular purpose. I do not think that it is any part of our duty to provide specially or to go around hunting work clearly for the purpose of keeping people employed until such time as their services may be needed for the performance of that which the law requires to be done, and I hope that the bill will not pass.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER. Five minutes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HARDWICK].

Mr. HARDWICK. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in support of this bill. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] entirely misapprehends the reason this bill is offered. It is not offered, as suggested by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], for the primary purpose of keeping people employed—not at all, although that may be one of its results.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say that that is one of the statements made in your report.

Mr. HARDWICK. No, sir. I will stand by my statement. Here is the statement made in the report:

> Your committee deems it proper to frankly inform the House that it is necessary to assign some additional work to the Census Office during the brief remaining interval preceding the Thirteenth Census, if the present trained clerical force of the office is to be kept together, substantially intact, to assist in the work of the next decennial enumeration.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is false economy for the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], chairman of one of the great committees of this House, to get up and insist that the great, organized, compact, and well-drilled force in the Census Office ought to be turned out just as we are about to begin another census. To do so would be "penny wise and pound foolish." The Government would lose more money in taking the Thirteenth Census by adopting his idea and disbanding this force, if he is right about what would be the effect of not passing this bill, than would possibly be covered by any expense involved in this bill. In fact, Mr. Speaker, I want to say to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] that if he will investigate the question he will find that the Census Bureau is one of the few branches of the governmental and departmental service that is not asking for any additional money at all.

Mr. TAWNEY. They are asking for additional work in order to keep the clerks employed that they have now in the service.

Mr. HARDWICK. If in theory the gentleman is opposed to a permanent Census Office, he ought to have expressed that opposition in his vote and voice on the floor of this House when he voted for the law making a permanent Census Office four years ago.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us examine, for just a moment, the provisions of this bill. It proposes to amend the act of 1902, establishing the permanent Census Office, by giving to the Director of the Census authority to collect and publish information upon five great subjects, concerning which either no provision or inadequate provision is made by existing law.

First, statistics as to life, fire, marine, and casulty insurance. The subject, entirely omitted from inquiries included in the Twelfth Census, is so much before the country at present as to convince the House of its importance by a bare statement of the proposition. There is no valid reason for objecting to the collection of statistics on this great subject, in all of its branches, on the ground that the Supreme Court has held that insurance is not interstate commerce and that Congress has, therefore, no authority to regulate it. We collect statistics on many subjects over which the Congress does not even claim jurisdiction under our dual system of Government. The same answer is the obvious one to the equally illogical objection that the House ought not to collect statistics of this general subject because it has voted to instruct its Judiciary Committee to investigate the legal question as to what jurisdiction, if any, it has over insurance. Nor I am impressed with the argument of my friend from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES] that these statistics will be inadequate and only half truth. In the first place they will be largely a compilation of the State reports, and, while they may not be perfect, will be vastly better than what we now have—more reliable and more easily obtained by the people.

The second subject upon which these reports are authorized to be collected is fisheries—a most important industry of this country; one which supports many people, and one concerning which we have not now, and have never had, any adequate statictical information.

The third subject of investigation is electrical industries, and provision is made for a report every five years on this subject, just as we have a report on manufactures every five years. Considering the marvelous development of electrical science in the recent past, and the equally marvelous possibilities of its future development, as well as its potent influence upon our civilization, it seems to me that we ought to have for distribution among the people statistical information as to its development and progress.

The fourth subject is savings banks, and I submit that the people are generally interested and entitled to full information about them, as full and accurate as the Government can give.

The last general subject upon which investigation and report is contemplated is criminal and judicial statistics. There are no reports on this most important subject in the Twelfth Census, and such State reports as we have are usually woefully inadequate and incomplete. I know that from a careful personal investigation of the subject extending through several years. If we are to make any attempt to prevent, to minimize, crime, surely we must have some adequate provision for collecting the data from which we must study its causes. Every intelligent and progressive nation on earth except ours has adequate provisions and a progressive and enlightened system for the collection of these invaluable statistics, and one of the most important things that will be accomplished by the passage of this bill will be to supply this deficiency.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this bill was unanimously reported by the Committee on Census, and all of the members of that committee believe that it is a wise measure and ought to pass. Gentlemen may think little of the Census Bureau, and seek to undervalue or to underestimate the importance of its work. Of course statistical information on all the great public questions and business questions may not be absolutely necessary, in the sense that bread is necessary, or clothing is necessary, but in this intelligent, progressive, and pushing age accurate and reliable information on many subjects has become almost as necessary as bread to the hungry, or as fuel to the freezing. The man who undertakes to get along without it is at woeful disadvantage. The people of the United States realize the truth of this statement, they appreciate the splendid work of our present Census Bureau, they realize its importance, and in my judgment, so far from wishing to cripple it or to narrow its scope, would be glad to see it strengthened and the scope of its investigations and inquiries broadened along every line suggested by the progress and development of the people. I therefore earnestly hope that this bill will pass.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. My time has expired.

The SPEAKER. The time has expired on both sides.

The question is on suspending the rules and passing the bill with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which has been read.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. MANN. I demand a division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 72, noes 30.

So (two-thirds having voted in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill was passed.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. HARDWICK. I make the same request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, leave will be given.

There was no objection.

PURCHASE OF CERTAIN COAL CLAIMS IN THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and consider the bill H. R. 12864 in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin moves to suspend the rules and to consider immediately in the House as in Committee of the Whole the bill H. R. 12864, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> A bill (H. R. 12864) to provide for the purchase of certain coal lands in the Philippine Islands, and to authorize the lease of same and of the Batan Military Reservation for the purpose of securing a local coal supply to the United States Government in the Philippine Islands.
> Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to purchase the coal claims owned by Messrs. Munoz and Villanueva, lying on the Island of Batan, Philippine Islands, and upon which the War Department now holds an option; and to provide for the purchase of said claims the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and the above sum is made immediately available in order that purchase may be made before the said option expires, to wit, before March 1, 1906.

Mr. TAWNEY. I demand a second, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota demands a second.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that a second be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Wisconsin is entitled to twenty minutes under the rule, and the gentleman from Minnesota is entitled to twenty minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. By unanimous consent can the time for debate be extended?

The SPEAKER. It can be.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask unanimous consent that the time for this debate be extended.

The SPEAKER. One moment. The Chair understands the gentleman's motion to be to suspend the rules and make it in order to consider this bill in this House as in Committee of the Whole at once. Now, the gentleman from Wisconsin desires what?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I ask if the time for debate on this bill can be extended?

Mr. TAWNEY. I understood the gentleman to ask for a suspension of the rules and passage of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The motion is to suspend the rules and make it in order for the House at once to proceed to the consideration of the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole House, the same as any other matter of legislation.

Mr. TAWNEY. Under the rules, that being the motion, is debate limited to twenty minutes on a side? Now, understanding the motion, I withdraw my demand for a second.

Mr. PAYNE (to Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin). There is no objection.

Mr. TAWNEY. I withdraw my demand for a second. I thought it was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MANN. I will ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he will not make the request for a division of the time in the House?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am entirely willing to have the time divided when we come to consider the bill.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say to the gentleman that the debate will proceed under the rules of the House, and, of course, alternate.

Mr. MANN. But the gentleman can move the previous question any time he likes to.

The SPEAKER. Yes; within his hour.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I am willing that the opposition to the bill shall control one-half of the time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, has a second been demanded on that motion?

The SPEAKER. Demanded and ordered.

Mr. TAWNEY. How much time does the gentleman from Wisconsin intend to occupy in the affirmative?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. About twenty minutes.

Mr. PAYNE. In the House on the bill?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. We ought to have an hour's debate?

Mr. TAWNEY. An hour on a side?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I think so. I understand there is to be opposition to the bill, and I think an hour on a side ought to suffice.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, for the information of the House, that under the latest ruling if this motion should prevail then the bill would come immediately before the House for consideration under the five-minute rule, without general debate, except as general debate may be had by unanimous consent.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, I suppose general debate could be allowed by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Undoubtedly.

Mr. PAYNE. I ask unanimous consent that this resolution be considered as passed, and that we have two hours for general debate in the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I object. We want to beat that motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] is entitled to twenty minutes, and the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] to twenty minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I reserve my time.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, the demand for a second was withdrawn by myself, and I do not know now whether we are considering the motion to suspend the rules and consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole or——

The SPEAKER. A second was ordered by unanimous consent, and the gentleman from Minnesota having——

Mr. TAWNEY. I reserve my time.

The SPEAKER. Both gentlemen having reserved their time, would bring the House to a vote.

Mr. TAWNEY. To a vote on the question of suspending the rules?

The SPEAKER. That is all.

The question was taken on the motion to suspend the rules and consider the bill in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of Union, and the Speaker announced that in his opinion two-thirds had voted in favor of the motion.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 86, noes 4.

Accordingly (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The bill is before the House for consideration in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. OLMSTED. I wish to inquire whether it goes immediately under the five-minute rule or is open to general debate?

The SPEAKER. Except by unanimous consent, it comes before the House for immediate consideration under the five-minute rule.

Mr. OLMSTED. I ask unanimous consent that there may be two hours devoted to general debate, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin and one hour by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, it seems that the gentleman from Minnesota is not opposed to this bill.

Mr. TAWNEY. Oh, yes; I am.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. There are some gentlemen on this side of the House who are opposed to the bill, and I object to that proposition.

Mr. TAWNEY. This proposition was before the Committee on Appropriations and voted down unanimously, and I am opposed to the bill just as much as the gentleman is.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I judged from the fact that the gentleman took the negative side of the proposition and then did not debate it or place it before the House that he was not opposed to it.

Mr. TAWNEY. That was simply on the question of getting the bill considered.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I should like to ask the gentleman from Minnesota if he intends to control the time in favor of the negative side of the proposition?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that there may be two hours' general debate upon this bill, one-half of the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] and one-half of the time by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the object of this bill is the purchase of certain coal claims or mining rights held by Spaniards on lands in the island of Batan, in the Philippine Archipelago. The Philippine government and the United States Government together consume annually about 200,000 tons of coal in the Philippine Islands. Sixty thousand of these tons are consumed in the city of Manila, in the ice plant and for other government purposes. The balance, 140,000 tons, is consumed in coast-guard vessels, transports, small launches, etc. The two governments now pay about $5 a ton for this aggregate of 200,000 tons, making a total annual expenditure of about $1,000,000.

As originally introduced the bill contained two sections. The first section appropriated $50,000 for the purchase of these claims; the second section provided that after the Government had secured these claims, and thus acquired control of the entire island, it should have the right to lease the coal lands on the island upon such conditions that the government of the Philippines and the Government of the United States should each secure the coal it uses in the islands at not more than 10 per cent above cost. The outside cost on the boat in the harbor at Batan would be $2 a ton, and 10 per cent added would be $2.20 for a maximum.

Secretary Taft testified, as did Lieutenant Wigmore, of the Corps of Engineers, representing the Philippine Commission, that by purchasing these claims and making a lease on such terms the two Governments could save about $400,000, and perhaps more, annually from the money that now has to be expended for coal.

Secretary Taft in his testimony said—and I think it is important, because I understand that certain gentlemen oppose this bill on the ground that, as they allege, it is socialistic—Secretary Taft testified that the Philippine Commission was opposed to buying these claims and itself working the mines because it did not wish to go into the mining business. Secretary Taft also said that he himself was anxious that the Government of the United States shall not go into the business of mining. So that there never has been any intention on the part of the government of the Philippine Islands or of the Government of the United States or of Secretary Taft to have either of these Governments enter into the mining business in the Philippine Islands or elsewhere.

But in order to make assurance doubly sure the Committee on Insular Affairs have stricken out, or propose to strike out, the second section of the bill, providing for the leasing of these lands, so as to leave only the first section—the naked proposition of the purchase of these mining rights from the Spaniards.

Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of War in his testimony declared that in his judgment there is no question whatever as to the validity of these Spanish mining claims. They have been investigated for three or four years. The documents have all been looked up, and Secretary Taft says that if there had been any possible way by which these Spaniards could have been dispossessed that they would have been dispossessed and the Government not asked for this appropriation.

The Spaniards took up these claims in 1890—about eight years before we went there. They have held them ever since. They are on the only harbor in the island of Batan, and that harbor is one of the best in the Philippine Archipelago. There are 32 feet of water within 400 yards of where mines can be opened on these Spanish claims. But these claims, covering 300 acres of land, are so cunningly located that they absolutely block all access to that harbor from the other coal lands which have been reserved by the Government of the United States.

The island is a great ridge, sloping both ways to the sea.

The Government of the United States secured this option in 1903, and then sent Lieutenant Wigmore, of the Corps of Engineers, to make an inspection. His report has been printed. For a year and a half, with diamond drills, he bored thoroughly over one-half of that island. He testified before the Committee on Insular Affairs that from borings on that one half and from an inspection and a few borings made on the other half and from the outcroppings on it, in his judgment this island, 10 miles one way by 5 miles the other in area, is practically one bed of coal. And yet the Government of the United States, which has reserved all back of these 300 acres, is blocked from access to the harbor by these cunningly located Spanish claims, the perfect validity of which can not be doubted, according to the testimony of Secretary Taft, based on his own investigations and that of the mining expert, now a judge in the archipelago, who investigated these claims for three years.

Before this option was given the Spaniards had already mined some coal there, which they sold for $7 or more a ton, but, as is their custom, they had not made a careful investigation. Lieutenant Wigmore went down there under the orders of the War Department and investigated thoroughly for a year and ten months. The Government expended $37,000 in making this investigation. It satisfied Lieutenant Wigmore, satisfied the Philippine Commission, satisfied Secretary Taft, that as a pure business proposition the buying of this option would be a good investment for the United States Government. When it has this option, then it will perfectly control this coal bed 10 by 5 miles in area. Until it has the option it can not control it, because if people were to open mines on the lands back of these 300 acres they would have to build a 3 or 4 mile mountain railroad at large expense per mile, or construct very expensive tunneling in order to reach the harbor at all.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman permit a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I do.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The gentleman says that the Government has expended $37,000 to investigate this coal and ascertain its value.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Did the Government at that time have an option on the coal?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It did.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has the time expired?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It expires the first of next month, the 1st of March.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. That is what I was trying to get at. It is necessary that the bill should pass in order to take up that option?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Otherwise the Government would lose the $37,000 and the advance in price of this land which would come because of the report and investigation that it has made.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Undoubtedly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has that investigation been made public?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes; and there is a printed report, with diagrams complete, by Lieutenant Wigmore, the engineer who made the investigation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then this investigation would bring a great many bidders against the United States, and the probability is it would fall into the hands of some corporation and we would have to pay vastly more.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is true.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then as a business proposition it is well to take up the option.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The Government to-day buys its coal in Japan and Australia and pays on an average, as I have already said $5 a ton, and sometimes more than that. If we can get these claims, some arrangement can be made by the Government so that it can secure its coal at a very small advance above cost price. That, however, is for future legislation.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What is the quality of this coal, bituminous or anthracite?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Bituminous, and the coal is the best in the Orient.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Of what class—first class bituminous?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. No; it is not quite as good as Pocahontas, but it is better than the Japanese or Australian coal.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. What is the thickness of the veins?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. From 2 to 13 feet in thickness, and from 12 to 23 feet.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Can the gentleman tell whether it is a blanket vein, a level vein, or does it dip so that it would be hard to handle?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. It goes up 500 feet above the sea and then they have drilled with diamond drills in the veins 300 feet below the sea level. The engineer said that his only regret was that they did not have drills so that they could have drilled 5,000 feet to see how deep the veins do go.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Then it seems to be a good proposition, according to what the gentleman says?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Yes. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to take any part in this debate, but I do want to state that I have a pretty good knowledge of bituminous coal. I shall only take a minute. I live in the center of the great coal fields of Ohio. Forty per cent of the coal of that State is mined in my district. I have examined this coal very carefully, and I saw specimens of the coal in the Philippine Islands, some seven or eight tons of them. I know that this is by far the best coal in the archipelago, and while I do not think it is equal to the best Pocahontas coal, it is a very fine, good quality of bituminous coal. That is all I desire to say.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question. I do not understand from reading the report made that the veins slope from 500 feet above the sea level down below, but that the engineer, Lieutenant Wigmore, found a vein probably running in general like other veins, a blanket vein. He found one vein about 500 feet above the sea level and with his diamond drill went to other veins and found one as much as 300 feet below the sea level. It is not a vertical vein at all, but all of them blanket veins. Is not that so?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Here is what he says:

> With these diamond drills I found that the coal measures were two in number, separated by a thick strata of limestone, and that in the upper set of measures there was probably from 6 to 10 feet of coal, and in the lower set from 20 to 25 feet, as revealed by the drill holes. The continuity of these seams has not been developed. Our drills were not sufficiently powerful to go any further down than 300 feet. The continuity in the direction of the strike was very well proven by the outcrops which we traced from the shore to the reservation boundary line which crosses the island and will be shown in the first map in the pamphlet.

Mr. KEIFER. But I still do not get the answer. I did not mean a vein which ran practically vertically and practically on a level with the sea, but they have found by penetrating through that another distinct vein 300 feet below.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. He also says:

These coal deposits rise to about 500 feet above the sea level, which means that for a certain period of time we can run in at sea level, mining to the rise in the veins, so that the coal can be dropped by gravity methods instead of having expensive machinery for hauling it up.

I reserve the balance of my time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD].

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, my objection to this bill is not to the Government obtaining some way of getting its coal in the Philippine Islands. I have read this report, and from the report made I believe it is a pretty good class of coal that we can mine in those islands, but from the report I find that they do not propose to sell to the Government but 300 acres of land for $50,000. From the report it shows that a great portion of this coal land is now located on Government property. It is not on this 300 acres, but it is on property that belongs to the Government now, and the only claim that can possibly be made as to why we should pay the high sum of $50,000 for 300 acres of land, over $166 an acre for this land to these Spaniards, is that we can not mine ourselves our coal lands belonging to the Government unless we pay this hold up of these Spanish claims. Now, in the first place, they have not got but 300 acres. An acre is about 200 feet square, and if the square acres were laid along the shores of that bay it would only amount to 60,000 feet, or 12 miles, which would not possibly cover the circumference of the bay. You know perfectly well, and I do, that these claims must be broader than a mere acre square, and if they are run back as far in the interior as they front on the shore, the entire claims can only cover a mile or two of this bay, leaving a vast space for us to establish our docks and our yards to mine our own coal. It may be possible that we can not come down to the exact spot where we want to, but from the report of this gentleman I judge that the island is pretty well covered by this vein of coal, and if we can not operate at the best place that is covered by these Spanish claims, certainly for less than $50,000 we can reach a place on that bay where we can load and ship this coal.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Will the gentleman permit me just a word there?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. The gentleman makes the assertion that certainly we can find a space from which we can reach our coal?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I will say in reply to that that Lieutenant Wigmore stated positively and emphatically, and he was there two years on the spot, that it would cost a great deal more than $50,000 to reach the coal which the Government owns from the shore, and I have just turned to what Secretary Taft says. He says—

There are coal claims which have been located and perfected by Spaniards according to our mining laws which cover all the mining lands directly accessible from this shore.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, now, wait. I will ask my friend, as I have but five minutes, not to make a speech.

I understand that thoroughly. The outcrop of the particular lands is through this Spanish claim, but anybody that knows anything about mining lands—the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] does—knows that you do not have to reach an outcrop of coal at one particular point. If there is an outcrop on the bay there are surely outcrops in the interior, but if the drift comes out on the face of the bluff back in behind the bluff you can sink a shaft and reach the vein.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The engineers report that this is the only available access to this coal, and the probability is, it is fair to assume, it would not have been taken possession of and held all these years unless it did occupy that position.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have no doubt it is the most available place by which to approach this coal. I do not deny that. I have looked at the map, and find it is a large harbor, and that this island covers a large space of territory—I think about 450 square miles. These 300 acres can not—I know, because I have looked at the map—cover the face of the harbor. There are bound to be other approaches; possibly not so good. But I say on the very face of this proposition it shows that somebody is trying to hold the United States Government up. The coal does not belong to them. It belongs to the Government now. It is merely an approach, and if we want to get our coal out and can not get it in any other way, I say we should condemn a right of way to that harbor at a reasonable price and not have the Government of the United States held up to pay this enormous price for the mere privilege of landing its own coal on the shore.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Now, the information before the committee is to the effect that if we do not close this option, and have to operate the coal mines that are behind the lands that are controlled by the Spaniards, our right of way and the expense of constructing a road to our coal lands will exceed the price of this option.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. But can not my friend see that this option is worth nothing to anybody but the United States? The United States owns the coal to-day. Who is going to buy an option to enter a coal field that they can not take away from the United States?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has expired.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Why can not the mines be operated by any private corporation?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Because the land belongs to the Government.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The Government buying an option on its own land?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. An option to get in and mine its own land.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED].

Mr. OLMSTED. I am in a general way opposed to Government ownership of coal land, and particularly of Government operation of coal mines, but this is rather a condition than a theory that confronts us. The Government already owns a very large and valuable body of coal land in the island of Batan. The approach, the land between that harbor and the coal owned by the Government, is owned or controlled by two Spaniards, and, notwithstanding the statements—the conjectures—of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], Secretary Taft, who has been there, and who has devoted a large amount of time and study to this subject, said before our committee that the option of those two Spaniards absolutely controls the entrance to that harbor. This is his language:

As soon as we learned that the island was useful for the production of coal we reserved for the Government all the western half of it that had not already been located. On investigation it turned out that the two or three Spaniards who had these valid claims under the Spanish mining law had taken up all the claims which lay immediately along the harbor, and had pushed back, so to speak, the Government ownership beyond the line of hills or mountains, and made impossible access to the harbor from the claims which the Government could establish or reserve, and the only way of reaching those other veins of coal on the island (those already owned by the Government) was around by the sea.

This bill proposes that the Government shall buy out those intervening claims.

Lieutenant Wigmore, who was before the committee, and who has been in the islands for two years investigating the subject, stated that if the Government did not secure these 300 acres it would cost the Government many times more than the $50,000 involved to cause an opening in any other way to the land which the Government now owns from the harbor in order to get the coal which the Government owns to the harbor. The acquisition of these 300 acres will largely reduce the expense of reaching and developing the Government's own land.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the option which we are probably about to buy is on land between the coal property of the Government and the harbor?

Mr. OLMSTED. That is exactly the situation. These 300 acres are right on the harbor, between the water and the Government's coal.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Then, Mr. Speaker, I want to ask another question: Then, if that is true, will not that merely be buying a right of way to the property of the Government, and is it necessary for the Government of the United States to buy a right of way at a price which some gentlemen think is unreasonable?

Mr. OLMSTED. Why, Mr. Speaker, this option is so valuable it has been held at $300,000, and the Government has secured an option at $50,000. Lieutenant Wigmore has stated that there is so much coal under that 300 acres that at the small royalty of 15 cents a ton the coal under that 300 acres would amount to $250,000, so that the $50,000 that we are to give amounts to the equivalent of an infinitesimal royalty of 3 cents per ton, and the Government gets the right of way for nothing.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Why should not the Philippine government buy this, if any government is to do so?

Mr. OLMSTED. Because the United States Government wants the coal for its own purposes, for the use of the United States, and the United States already owns the balance of the coal.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him this question: Does this proposition contemplate the United States entering into the coal business?

Mr. OLMSTED. Not at all. It contemplates that the Government will lease all these lands to individuals at a reasonable, practical price, with a provision that the Government shall have all the coal it wants at the bare cost of mining, with an addition of 10 per cent.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. Are they working these mines now?

Mr. OLMSTED. The mines are not in operation now.

Mr. NORRIS. Why are not the mines in operation now?

Mr. OLMSTED. For the reason that the Spaniards have not the capital to operate them, and I suppose it is also true that they have not the enterprise. They know that they have the key to the situation. They are just waiting the opportunity. If we do not take this option they will sell it to somebody else. The Government has already expended $37,000 in developing and establishing this coal and making it valuable for them, and if we do not take the land somebody else will take it at a very much higher figure.

Mr. NORRIS. What has been the investment of the Government in developing this coal?

Mr. TAWNEY. The whole investment has been $30,000 for the whole of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. OLMSTED. Thirty-seven thousand dollars for the island of Batan only. Lieutenant Wigmore spent two years or more in the investigation.

Mr. NORRIS. Why should we go into the coal business here in this particular place any more than in any other place? Why not let the private parties develop this and sell it to somebody else for more, if they want to, and if you had to have the coal take your chances with the other parties?

Mr. OLMSTED. The difficulty in that proposition is that the Government itself now owns this land except the 300 acres, and the Government has made this valuable. No other people will want to work the Government's land unless they can control these 300 acres which control access to the harbor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. If the gentleman will permit me to ask him a question. The gentleman comes from a coal country; I will ask him if he ever heard of a responsible company investing its money in 300 acres to develop a coal field?

Mr. OLMSTED. Well, I will say to the gentleman that I have known many companies that have invested their money in the development of a coal field a good deal less than 300 acres.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. And I will say that only the other day I heard of an instance where parties bought 80 acres, at $800 an acre.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. OLMSTED. I have known of many instances where a man has bought a very much smaller tract of land which afforded the key to his mine, buying land which lay between his mine and the railway, for instance, and paying very large figures.

This tract, Mr. Speaker, is absolutely the key to the whole situation. Both Secretary Taft and Lieutenant Wigmore say that the land of the Government can not be economically operated without control of this 300 acres. The coal would have to come through this 300 acres. It would involve not less than half a million of dollars of extra cost to get the coal to the harbor unless they used this 300 acres, because there is a mountain there, and it will cost at least $500,000 to dig a tunnel or to build a railroad necessary to get out the coal. It would cost ten times more to do that than to buy these 300 acres.

That is about all I want to say. This coal is of particularly good quality. Not as good as Pocahontas coal, but much better than the Japanese and Australian coal. It can be mined at a cost of about $2 a ton, whereas the Government is now paying an average of $5 a ton for its coal at that point.

Mr. NORRIS. Even if we do not accept this option, if coal can be mined there at a cost of $2 a ton, will not that continue to be true regardless of what we may do in the matter?

Mr. OLMSTED. It can be mined for $2 a ton, but it will not be sold to the Government for $2 a ton. If we secure control of it, we propose, whoever operates it, that they shall let the Government have it at a bare increase of 10 per cent over the cost. These Spaniards may get somebody else to operate it, but the operators in that case will not sell to the Government at cost and 10 per cent added. We will have to pay full price for coal and at the same time be cut off from the economical operation of the land the Government already owns.

Mr. MADDEN. Why have they not secured somebody to operate it heretofore?

Mr. OLMSTED. They know they have a very good thing there, but probably they have not the capital to operate it. And it may be, just as has been suggested here, that nobody would want to put the money in to open up a coal mine and transport the coal from the island to the market, on so small an acreage as 300 acres with the Government, which must always be the heaviest consumer, owning all the other coal on the island.

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLMSTED. Certainly.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems that there was a prior option on this land, which option expired June 11, 1905. There did not seem to be any danger then about letting that option expire.

Mr. NORRIS. What was the amount of that?

Mr. MADDEN. It was the same amount that this option is for, $50,000.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Do you find anything to indicate what that option cost?

Mr. OLMSTED. I will not yield for a speech. The Government at that time had not spent $37,000 to develop and show up this coal and its quality. There is only one-half of 1 per cent of sulphur in this coal. It is clean coal, worth a good deal more than the Japanese or Australian coal, which is being sold there now to this Government at $5 a ton.

Mr. TAWNEY. What evidence has the gentleman that this is superior to Japanese and Australian coal?

Mr. OLMSTED. I have the evidence of Lieutenant Wigmore, who investigated, who sunk a diamond drill into it, took out the core, the actual coal itself, submitted it to actual engineers in the Navy and in the Army, had it analyzed, dug out 400 tons and had it tested, and tried the actual burning, so that we know to a certainty what this coal is. It is simply a business proposition; not that the Government shall go into the coal business, but that it shall have the key to the coal that it does own. Only a few years ago we had some such question up for consideration in relation to the asphalt mines in the Uncompahgre Indian Reservation. We provided for the leasing of them. The other day we provided for the leasing of certain Government lands in the West for a buffalo pasture. We do not propose to mine this coal, but to lease the land to other people, on condition that the Government shall have all it needs at 10 per cent above the actual cost of mining.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman state upon what authority the Secretary of War entered into this option? What authority had he to take the option?

Mr. OLMSTED. I have not investigated so far into it as that. I assume that he had the authority. The acts of public officers are presumed to be valid until the contrary is shown. Whatever authority he had, he has entered into it.

Mr. HAY. But if he had no right to enter into the option, then these parties would not be bound by the option.

Mr. OLMSTED. The Secretary of War stated before our committee that the option had been taken. Whether he took it while he was Secretary of War or recommended it while he was governor of the Philippines I do not remember, but you may be very certain he would not have taken the option or entered into any contract without abundant authority.

Mr. MADDEN. It seems that this option was taken by a lieutenant in the Army, whose name I do not now recall.

Mr. HAY. Lieutenant Wigmore?

Mr. MADDEN. No; not Lieutenant Wigmore, but another lieutenant.

Mr. OLMSTED. In whosesoever name it was taken, the Government now has the opportunity to take this land, if it wants it, between now and a certain date in March, and if it does not take it now the opportunity will be forever gone. By taking it we can, it is believed, save to the Government some $400,000 in the cost of the coal it annually purchases for use in and about the Philippines. Shall we try to save it or shall we not? That is the whole question.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. If the gentleman will pardon me for the suggestion, the option was taken by General Davis, with the approval of the Secretary of War.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, there is no State in the Union where coal can be found in greater abundance than it can in Illinois, and there, in the best agricultural regions of the State, you can buy not only the coal lying in veins 6 to 9 feet deep, but you can buy title to the land on which vast amounts of money can be made by agriculture, for $50 an acre. We are now called upon to vote to buy 300 acres of land on the side of a mountain to meet the demands of some Spanish freebooters and to pay for that land $166 an acre; and when we buy the land we are engaging to go into the coal business. The proposition here is not so much the question of the purchase of the land——

Mr. OLMSTED. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. OLMSTED. At what price per ton can the gentleman deliver coal from the land he speaks of to Manila?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know at what price we can deliver the coal to Manila, but we can purchase the coal in Illinois at about a dollar a ton.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Take one of the acres that the gentleman refers to, where he says that there are 6-foot veins that he can purchase for $50. How many tons of coal is there on that acre? At 10 cents a ton royalty, would not the value be more than $300?

Mr. KEIFER. More than a thousand dollars.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes; more than a thousand dollars.

Mr. MADDEN. It does not at all affect the fact that you can buy the land that the coal is in for $50 an acre. If you could buy that coal in the heart of civilization at that price, there is no reason in my mind why we should go to Manila or any other place in the Philippine Islands and pay $166 an acre, not for the land or for its title, but for the doubtful claim of these Spanish freebooters, who are now demanding of the Government of the United States a fabulous price for something I do not believe they have.

Mr. OLMSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman if in Illinois or anywhere else in the United States he can buy for $50 an acre of land with two veins of coal on it, one from 6 to 13 feet wide and the other from 10 to 23 feet wide?

Mr. MADDEN. I say to the gentleman that we have bought land at the price indicated by me. I do not know what you can do in case you have two veins 6 and 13 feet, but I do know that it is not the intention of the American people to allow this Government to engage in the coal-mining business. Nor is it the intention of the American people to allow the Government to exploit coal mines for the purpose of leasing them to great contractors in California. If these men believe in the virtue of the coal underlying this property, who say they are willing to make a lease for it, why should they not expend their money in the purchase of the option and in the development of the coal? Let them enter upon the business as a commercial proposition, and not undertake to make a contract with the Government of the United States, which will give them a profitable business by enabling them to furnish the coal needed by the Navy of this country before they will enter upon the enterprise at all.

The matter was carefully considered by the Committee on Appropriations. All the testimony heard before the Committee on Insular Affairs was heard before the Committee on Appropriations, and the Committee on Appropriations voted unanimously to reject the propostion. This option which now exists is simply a renewal of an option which has heretofore existed. There is no reason to believe that if we fail to take advantage of the option, the price of this land will be increased. If there is any reason to believe that, why was not the price increased after the first option expired?

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Secretary of War or any official of the War Department was authorized to expend the money which was expended in the exploitation of this coal proposition out of the traveling expenses of the Army, as I understand it was expended. I believe the representatives of the people should be called upon for their approval of such a proposition as this before the expenditure is made, and if an option was to be had at all, it should be had by and with the consent and approval of the Congress. We ought not to go into the coal business, and if we were to go into it, we ought not to pay this kind of a price for these coal lands. We can get all the coal for all the needs of the Government on Government land. We can cross the land said to be owned by the Spaniards with little or no cost, and we ought not to be held up by them for this purchase.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. How much time, Mr. Speaker, have we consumed on each side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. CAPRON). The gentleman from Wisconsin has thirty-three minutes remaining and the gentleman from Minnesota forty-nine minutes remaining.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN].

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, like the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED], I am generally opposed to the Government engaging in commercial enterprises. Unlike him, I am specifically opposed to it also, and I believe that if this is the tempting commercial proposition which gentlemen say it is—and I presume it is, because they are honorable gentlemen and well informed—some one would be glad to employ enough capital to take up the option and develop the mines. If they did they would undoubtedly sell the Government its coal upon a reasonable basis. It is suggested in the report that the Government proposes in certain events to lease this land, if it should buy it, upon the guaranty that it is to be supplied its own coal at 10 cents a ton above the cost of production. There is nothing anywhere in the bill that I can find——

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will excuse me, but I am sure he does not intend to make that statement. It is 10 per cent, not 10 cents a ton.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I mean 10 per cent. It is 20 cents a ton on $2 a ton estimated cost of production, but there is nothing in the bill which puts any limitation upon the cost of production, and there is nothing in the report which suggests that any limitation has been put upon the cost of production, and therefore there is no limitation on the cost of the coal to the Government.

Mr. GRAHAM. That is all stricken out of the bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is in the first section of the bill.

Mr. GRAHAM. The bill provides for taking up the option, but it does not provide for operating it or leasing it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Well, it is the gentleman's idea that the Government proposes to operate it.

Mr. GRAHAM. The Government has an option, whether it leases it or works it afterwards.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Does the gentleman think the Government would have any trouble in securing a lessee when it became the owner of the property?

Mr. GRAHAM. Not if it had these 300 acres which gives us the frontage and the water facilities for boats going up to the edge of the shore drawing 15 and 20 feet of water.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The gentleman means the 300 acres that the Government has an option on for $50,000?

Mr. GRAHAM. Yes.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is unlikely that the Government is ever able to buy anything under option more cheaply than an individual can, and if the Government can buy that land for $50,000 it is entirely probable that an individual could buy it for $50,000 or less; but, as the gentleman says, there will be no difficulty in securing a lessee in the event that the Government becomes the owner. It seems to me that the proposition is a very simple one. The Government ought not to engage in a commercial enterprise in the Philippines or elsewhere, and particularly in this case, because all it has to do is to leave it alone and let these people sell their tempting business scheme to those who have capital and who, he says, stand ready to take it off the hands of the Government as lessee.

Mr. GRAHAM. The Government now has all of the coal in all of this island of Batan—thousands of acres of coal. By the purchase of these 300 acres it obtains an access to the harbor for the mining, and therefore for the coal the Government has, and it can lease it to far greater advantage if they have this frontage. These Spaniards have this claim. It is not a bogus or a trumped-up claim. Secretary Taft tells us he has examined it and has had it examined not only by the best of Spanish authorities, but by American lawyers, and they have a bona fide claim. They not only have the coal, but have the surface, and there is much valuable timber there. Sometime ago I think this option would not have been worth $50,000, but the Government has expended $37,000 in showing that there is there good marketable coal, which can be used on the transports as well as by the Navy, provided the Navy does not desire excessive speed. If we neglect it, these other people will take up this option, and they will take it up for $50,000 and the Government will lose the $37,000 already expended.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] suggested—and his statement seems very plausible—that what we would be buying at $50,000 was really a right of way to the Government's own coal.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. And the right of way would cost us more than the coal lands.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It seems to me the Government could condemn that right of way.

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly; we could condemn a right of way across that to our own lands, if necessary.

Mr. SLAYDEN. That is what I am stating. I don't think there is any advantage in the contention that the price of $160 an acre is excessive under the circumstances.

Mr GROSVENOR. I will say to the gentleman from Minnesota that there is not a State in this Union where that can be done—where you can condemn a right of way for one coal property into another coal property. It has been tried in half a dozen States of the Union and defeated everywhere.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. JONES].

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, when this proposition was first presented to me it did not strike me very favorably, and not until I had heard the testimony of Secretary Taft and that of Lieutenant Wigmore, who spent nearly two years upon the island of Batan investigating the extent, character, and value of its coal deposits, did I reach the conclusion that it would be a good business proposition to acquire by purchase the claims or holdings upon which the option was given to representatives of our Government. There exists a great deal of misinformation upon the subject of the proposition embodied in this bill. In the first place, gentlemen say there are only 300 acres of this land, and that $50,000 represents $166 per acre. That is far from being the whole proposition and is a most misleading statement. Then we are told by other gentlemen that they do not believe in government ownership of coal land. In reply to this last objection, let me say that the island of Batan is 10 miles long and 5 miles wide, and that the whole of it is underlaid with the finest coal thus far found in the Philippines, or, for that matter, in the entire Orient. It happens that this Spanish concession lies immediately upon the harbor of Batan, in the Gulf of Albay, and it also happens, the statement of gentlemen to the contrary notwithstanding, that this claim or holding occupies the whole frontage of the island upon the deep water of the harbor, so that it is absolutely impossible for the Government to enter and utilize its own coal deposits from the harbor without going through or over the hills, which lie immediately behind it.

Upon this point permit me to read the testimony of Lieutenant Wigmore, who, I may say, is an army officer, a member of the Corps of Engineers, and who was detailed by the Secretary of War to make the investigation. This officer may surely be regarded as an expert, and he not only investigated with great thoroughness as to the quantity of the coal on the island, but he carefully analyzed the coal itself. He also visited the coal fields of Japan, and he reports that this Batan coal is superior to any other coal in the Philippine Islands and far superior to that in Japan. Let me read what he says as to the inaccessibility of the Government coal deposits:

> In order for us to enter our own deposits, if we do not control these claims, we would be under the necessity of going around to the south, where we have to do excessive tunnel and railroad work, and where there is no harbor at all. Therefore it is a great advantage for us to decrease the first cost of coal and own around where our entrances are easiest and where the mining can be done most advantageously and most cheaply. It is better to do that than to run up your production expenses later on.

So it appears from the testimony of Lieutenant Wigmore that we are not to pay $50,000 for the mere coal that is upon this Spanish holding, but that its ownership by the United States is very necessary to the economical operation of the valuable coal deposits owned now by us and which can not be reached from deep water except over or through it, and then only at great cost. It is clear to my mind that it would cost far more to construct a tunnel to reach the coal deposits owned now by the Government than it will cost to take up this option. Now, as to this option. We are told by gentlemen that if this option were as valuable as represented private capital and enterprise would only be too glad to secure it. This option was given about three years ago. It was given to the Government before there had been made any thorough investigation and before the extent and value of the coal deposits were definitely known. The Government has spent thousands of dollars, whether properly or improperly I shall not undertake to say, and as a result of this large expenditure it has been demonstrated that this coal field is exceedingly valuable. The Government can not, under the terms of its contract, transfer the option it holds to any third party. It must be apparent to every mind that this option is now far more valuable than when it was given, and should we, after so large an expenditure of time and of money, commit the folly of permitting it to lapse?

Now, Mr. Speaker, what boots it that coal lands can be bought cheaper in Pennsylvania or in Alabama than the cost of this particular piece of land? What we want and what we may badly need in the near future is a sufficient supply of coal in the Philippine Islands of good quality to meet our needs, present and prospective. If we take up this option we shall have all the coal lands we shall need for generations to come, and they will be so well protected and so easily accessible that the coal can be mined at a cost of not more than $2 a ton. We are now paying for Japanese and Australian coal of an inferior quality all the way from $4 to $6 a ton, and that which is being carried from Newport News—Pocahontas coal—is costing, delivered at Manila, $10 a ton.

The Pocahontas coal is used almost exclusively by the ships of our Asiatic Fleet and costs $10 per ton; that used in the furnaces of our Army transports which run between San Francisco and Manila either comes from Japan or Australia and costs some $4 or $5 less.

It is not a question, as gentlemen put it, as to whether the Government will go into the coal business. The Government already owns all the coal on the island of Batan, save that which is covered by this old Spanish grant, and the purpose in acquiring this Spanish holding is to enable it to properly enjoy and utilize what we already have. To approach what we have and what we some day may have great need for, unless we acquire this claim, will necessitate costly tunneling or the construction of an equally costly railroad. This is the naked proposition.

This is the only known available supply of coal in the Philippines, and without the ownership of this Spanish grant it can not be mined except at great and needless cost.

Mr. Speaker, as I have already said, the time may come when we will need to have coal in the Philippine Islands and when this Government will be obliged to mine this coal or go without this indispensable article. And in the event of war, when the ports of Japan and of Australia and of China are closed against us, we shall have to ship every pound of coal needed by our Navy at least 7,500 miles from the United States if it can not be mined on the little island of Batan.

When this option was given us, as I have said, it had not been established to the satisfaction of anybody that there were great coal deposits in the island of Batan. Nobody knew the extent or the value of this coal. Now we are intelligently advised upon the whole subject, and the owners themselves are no longer in ignorance. If this option, which expires on the 1st day of March, is not taken up by the Government, these people can dispose of it to private individuals at probably ten times what they could have disposed of it before the Government made these costly investigations and before the fact was abundantly established that the coal supply was practically inexhaustible and of very superior quality.

When the fortifications bill was under discussion a few days ago an attempt was made to show that the harbor of Batan could not be fortified and protected in the event that a naval station should be established in close proximity to the island. The gulf of Albay is a very deep and magnificent sheet of water, and both Secretary Taft and Lieutenant Wigmore have testified that this is one of the best harbors in the Philippines. The latter is on record as saying that it could easily be fortified and protected. I am willing to accept the testimony of these two gentlemen who are familiar with the locality and entirely capable of expressing an opinion.

There is not a ton of coal near Olongapo, where you propose to establish a naval station costing $30,000,000, and there is certainly none available near Cavite. All of the coal which is to supply our Navy and our transports and the Philippine government must come from the island of Batan, unless it be purchased either in Japan or Australia or be shipped from the United States, a distance of many thousands of miles. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is the best possible business proposition to close this option. [Applause.]

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, the course of this legislation has been very peculiar. The Philippine government was first asked to purchase this coal land, and after careful consideration it passed a resolution. The resolution was to this effect, that the Philippine government, if it did purchase these lands, would not have sufficient means with which to develop them. And the second ground upon which it refused to purchase them was that it did not deem it expedient for the Philippine government to purchase and operate coal mines.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I will say to my friend it is not the Philippine government; it is the United States Government. If that was the testimony before the gentleman's committee, he has been entirely misled.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the gentleman did not understand what I said. I am stating the substance of a resolution of the Philippine government, which is to be found in the report of Colonel Edwards, with respect to the acquiring of these coal lands.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Possibly I did not understand the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not the resolution with me now, but I will put the language of it in the RECORD.

The resolution of the Philippine Commission is as follows:

Resolved, That it is deemed by the Commission inexpedient for the insular government to avail itself of the option now held by the military authorities upon said coal lands or to purchase said lands in view of the fact that it lacks the necessary funds for the development of the property, and, moreover, is indisposed to go into the coal-mining business.

The Philippine government, having exhibited more sense than most men would suppose it would, passed that resolution, and the War Department turns to the Congress of the United States, I suppose, as a much easier body from which to obtain this authority. It had come to the Committee on Appropriations and stated there the urgency and necessity and propriety of this legislation. The Committee on Appropriations, having been informed that, in the opinion of the officials of the Navy Department, this coal was absolutely unfit for use in the naval vessels of the United States, that there was some question as to whether it was a very good kind of coal for the transports of the United States under the control of the Army, without considering at all the larger question as to whether the Government of the United Statse should purchase coal mines 7,000 miles away, refused to put the authorization in the urgent deficiency bill. Then, with that peculiar persistency for which the War Department is noted, it took the next step, and went to the Committee on Insular Affairs. It is a great misfortune, Mr. Speaker, that there are some committees of this House that have so little to do that whenever an opportunity is given to those committees to do something, the merits of the proposed legislation are frequently lost sight of, and such committees, in order to get a hearing before the House, will report any kind of a scheme which has the sanction of any official in any Department of the Government.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. I will ask the gentleman if he does not think that that kind of a criticism would come with much better grace from a gentleman who had been on the Committee on Appropriations more than three months?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, it might and might not. Sometimes "out of the mouths of children comes wisdom," I have heard somewhere.

Mr. SHERLEY. Babes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not the exact words of the quotation.

Mr. SHERLEY. You have not your Bible with you.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But it is not necessary that a man should serve ten years on the Committee on Appropriations to have a spark of intelligence, and it might perhaps be an advisable thing for some men to serve there even three months. This committee comes here and asks us to indorse a scheme of having the Government of the United States purchase a coal mine. For what purpose? In order to lease it to a very estimable and enterprising gentleman in California. That part has not been included in the bill. The object of acquiring this coal land by the United States is to lease it to Mr. Scott, the president of the Union Iron Works, so as to enable him to sell coal to the United States.

Mr. Speaker, we have had something like that in the not very recent past. The Government of the United States sold a custom-house in the city of New York to a national bank. It is paying 4 per cent interest on over $3,000,000 to the bank. The bank is not paying any taxes upon the property, because the title is still in the Government, and still it is asserted that the transaction was entirely for the benefit of the Government. And so it is with the plea that the United States should have its own coal mines in the Philippine Islands. We are asked to pass this bill. We use very much more coal in the United States than we ever will in the Philippine Islands, and it seems to me that if the Government is to acquire coal mines that it better start much nearer home, because every department of the Government has been outrageously treated here in this country by the coal companies.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know that I wish much more time. Mr. Speaker, what I desire is simply to emphasize the manner in which this legislation is brought in here by the Committee on Insular Affairs; that the War Department has tried to coerce—I will not use the word "coerce," but persuade, since that is the better word—has tried to persuade the Philippine government, which is largely under the influence of the Secretary of War, to acquire these coal lands. That government refused to have anything to do with it. Then the Secretary of War came before the Committee on Appropriations; that Committee refused to do anything, and then he went to the Committee on Insular Affairs.

Mr. OLMSTED. I want to ask the gentleman whether he thinks the Committee on Appropriations would have had any authority in reference to a matter of this kind, as it is not one that the Committee on Appropriations could legislate about?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, a little thing like authority seldom troubles the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. TAWNEY. I desire to state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this item came to the Committee on Appropriations in an estimate, with a view to obtaining an appropriation of $50,000 for this purpose, under the title "Transportation of the Army."

Mr. OLMSTED. Then it was entirely out of order if it came in that way, and the Committee on Appropriations, under our rules, had no jurisdiction over it.

Mr. MANN. The way it came before the Committee on Appropriations was just as much in order as it was to expend money in making an investigation for the same purpose.

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly it was.

Mr. MANN. Out of the same fund.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If it had not been for the careful scrutiny given to this subject by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] and the Committee on Appropriations, this coal land would have been purchased out of money appropriated for an entirely different purpose. That was the object. And when at last the Department was forced into daylight it went to the committee which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLMSTED] graces (the Committee on Insular Affairs), and to my very great surprise apparently the gentleman did not have that information regarding it which I know if he had had it would have prevented him from approving this project. This, in my opinion, is a vicious plan. It is an innovation.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. That immaculate Committee on Appropriations, did it make any appropriation for the payment of the $37,500 that have been expended for the purpose of ascertaining the condition of this coal mine?

Mr. TAWNEY. That payment was made out of the appropriation for the transportation of the Army.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it did not make any appropriation for that purpose, but that did not prevent the money being spent for that purpose by the Department. The investigation was made improperly, or without authorization, and the coal lands would have been purchased in the same improper manner if it had not been for the scrutiny that the matter received from the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RYAN. I should like to ask the gentleman why it is the intention of the Government to buy these coal lands and then to lease them to some individual in California?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, there seems to be a difference of opinion in the minds of some of these gentlemen as to the propriety of the Government owning and operating coal lands, and owning and leasing them to somebody else to operate; but the Committee on Insular Affairs evidently appreciated the impropriety of that, because the proposition, if I recollect (I have no copy of the bill in front of me), originally was to have a provision for leasing incorporated in the bill, but that has been taken out.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. TAWNEY. How much time have I remaining, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota has thirty-four minutes remaining.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I believe I have twenty-three minutes remaining.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is correct.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that I intend to close the debate on the negative side of the question, and if the gentleman wishes to use any time now I wish he would do so.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER].

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Speaker, while it may be a piece of indefensible arrogance for the Committtee on Insular Affairs to recommend a proposition that has been turned down by the Committee on Appropriations, I nevertheless think, from a business standpoint, that this is a very wise measure. The authority contained in this bill ought to be granted. Gentlemen have wondered why, if this coal deposit is such a valuable one, private capital had not been enlisted before for its development, and have expressed the opinion that there will be no difficulty in securing private capital for its development in the future.

Mr. Speaker, the very object of this bill is to prevent private corporations from securing control of this coal deposit. The United States Government and the government of the Philippine Islands now buy about 400,000 tons of coal a year, and they are absolutely dependent upon Australian and Japanese sources for that supply. They are required to pay from $5 to $6 a ton for an inferior quality of coal. Now, suppose a private corporation should secure control of this coal field, holding the key to the situation as it does, in what respect would the Government of the United States or the government of the Philippine Islands be benefited? The governments would be entirely at the mercy of the private corporation, and the very purpose of this bill is to give the Government of the United States and the government of the Philippine Islands relief from that situation—to put them in the situation where they can protect themselves against imposition, against monopoly, and against extortion.

Does anybody undertake to say that any private corporation would buy these coal deposits and develop them for the benefit of the Government?

The testimony before the Committee on Insular Affairs showed, as my friend from Virginia [Mr. JONES] said, that this coal is of the best quality produced in the Philippine Archipelago. It is the only coal, I think, produced in the Orient which can properly be classified as bituminous coal. It is better than the Japanese or Australian coal, because it contains more carbon and a smaller percentage of sulphur. It is better coal than can be bought elsewhere. We are now paying $5 or $6 a ton for coal used by the two governments, and if the Federal Government is authorized to buy this coal field and make a lease for its operation and development I think that there can be no doubt that they can get coal at $1.50 a ton and save $500,000 or $600,000 a year to the two governments.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I now yield three minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I am in favor of this bill, and I want to explain why I think this appropriation is in no manner inconsistent with the position which I and others on this side have hitherto taken in opposition to appropriations for permanent works in the Philippine Islands. We have opposed all appropriations for permanent purposes that looked to a permanent retention of the Philippine Islands and were consistent with no other theory.

This little island of Batan is 10 miles long by 5 miles wide, with a splendid bay, a good harbor, and with the only good coal in the Philippine Archipelago which has thus far been discovered. Whether we stay in the Philippines or whether we release them to govern themselves according to the sweet will of their own people, we will retain in the archipelago, as we did in Cuba, certain coaling and naval stations. This place is preeminently fitted as a place to be occupied for all time as a coaling station, and as it is a good thing to have a naval station where coal is, and a coaling station and a naval station together, it is preeminently fitted to be occupied as a naval station.

I am in favor of it for another reason, because it reenforces the line of argument I have made on other occasions. If we keep this as a coaling and naval station, we are all the less apt to keep Cavite, and I would rather not keep Cavite, because if we are ever to turn the Philippines loose at all we ought not to turn them loose "with a string to them"—with a naval station overaweing their capital and threatening them all the time. It seems to me this is an eminently wise expenditure of public money.

Somebody said something about government ownership of coal mines in that connection. Why, Mr. Speaker, this is no government ownership, except in the sense in which we have been engaged in government ownership for a hundred years. The United States Government owns Fortress Monroe at Norfolk; the United States Government always has owned in fee simple its military reservations, its naval stations, in order to secure exclusive Federal jurisdiction to protect the military and naval arms of the Government from local interference.

There is no proposition in this bill to operate the coal mines, so that there is no precedent set by it in that respect, and were there a proposition to work the coal mines for the exclusive use of the Navy itself there would be no great principle violated by that, because the Government of the United States would be working, not as a Government, but as a fee-simple owner of the land, and not working the mines for coal to sell, but coal to supply itself with the necessary defense—not "going into the coal business" at all. We need not go into that view of the case, because it is not in the bill. The proposition here is simply to buy this concession which is between the Government coal lands and the water which the Government proposes to control as a part of its coaling station, so that the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States over this naval reservation may be as complete and as full as it is right down here at Fortress Monroe, or at any other Government reservation.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I want to say, in view of the remarks of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER], that the opposition of myself and other members of the Committee on Appropriations to this bill is not because the proposition was rejected by that committee which has been considered and reported favorably by the Committee on Insular Affairs. If the Committee on Appropriations were actuated by any motive of that kind we could very easily have taken advantage of a point of order against the provision in this bill appropriating the money for the payment of the concession which it is proposed to purchase, for under the rules of the House the Committee on Insular Affairs has no jurisdiction whatever in respect to appropriations.

The opposition of myself and, I think, of my colleagues generally of the Committee on Appropriations to this measure is because the Government of the United States is not justified, on the testimony and on the facts before us, in embarking upon an enterprise which means the ultimate expenditure of several millions of dollars. You may try to cover up this proposition as much as you please, but when you get down to the last analysis it is merely a proposition to buy a coal mine—to buy coal lands in the Philippine Islands. From the standpoint of principle, there is no distinction between the purchase of coal lands in the Philippines and coal lands in the United States. The fact that these particular coal lands are in the Philippines does not change the principle at all. It would be just as competent for a committee to bring in a bill here appropriating money for the purchase of coal lands in the State of Pennsylvania or the State of West Virginia as to purchase the coal lands of the Philippine Islands. There is no distinction whatever. The fact that the Government of the United States needs coal in the Philippine Islands is no greater reason why we should embark upon this enterprise than the fact that we need coal and consume great quantities of coal in the United States. Pass this bill and you thereby establish a precedent that some day will be used in a way that will occasion serious embarrassment to the party now in power. But, Mr. Speaker, the expenditure of some $32,000 made in the investigation of the coal lands in the island of Batan was not authorized by Congress. The obtaining of the option was not authorized by Congress. It was done solely upon the motion of the head of an Executive Department, and if it were not for that act, unauthorized by law, unappropriated for by Congress, we to-day would not be considering the question of whether or not we should now appropriate this $50,000 to purchase 300 acres of coal land in the Philippine Islands.

Mr. Speaker, this proposition, when presented to the Philippine government, was rejected. There is no question about that. Are we more competent than they to determine whether or not it is wise to purchase this coal land? Mr. Wigmore was sent out there two years ago, and what kind of an investigation has he made? He investigated this coal land with diamond drills, by drilling down a certain depth, and now claims to have discovered coal equal to any coal in the Orient. The extent of that coal nobody knows. Notwithstanding the fact that these men have had this concession for sixteen years they have not yet been able to induce private enterprise to embark upon its development. If this coal land, as was said by a gentleman on this floor a moment ago, was as valuable as the gentlemen who have advocated this bill pretend or claim it is, $50,000 is altogether less than what it is worth. The fact is the investigation given by our committee to this subject led to this conclusion, that this was merely a coal prospect and we were paying, or asked to pay, $50,000 for a prospect, not for a mine. Nobody pretends to say that this coal has been developed to any extent. Now, let me read for one moment what Secretary Taft said when before the Committee on Appropriations, because I would not have the House think for a moment that the proposition was rejected by that committee without investigation. Secretary Taft said:

> I think the chance of making a profit is sufficient to justify the outlay. I have no interest in the matter; it is only a question of promoting, to begin with.

We are asked to expend $50,000 here for the purpose, Secretary Taft informed the committee, of promoting. Promoting what? Promoting the development of a coal mine for the benefit of private parties, and the justification for that statement is in the following answer of Secretary Taft to a question put to him by Mr. LITTAUER, and I read from the hearings:

Secretary TAFT. General Davis, acting, I think, for the Secretary of War, secured options on a number of claims which had been located by Spaniards. They had taken the best claims.

Mr. LITTAUER. Under the Spanish law?

Secretary TAFT. Yes, sir. They were proven to be legal and to have been kept valid by working on them from year to year. Their claims are situate on a very fine harbor, a harbor that is only 30 or 40 miles off the main line of vessels entering the Philippines from Guam and running directly from America to Manila. The option which we have is an option to take these claims on the western part of the island, and abutting immediately upon this harbor, for $50,000.

Now, I do not think that the Government ought ever to invest its capital in a coal mine; I mean, to go into the business of excavating coal.

Mr. LITTAUER. Operating a coal mine?

Secretary TAFT. Yes, sir. We have more than we can do in the Philippines without going into that; but I do think that if we could get these mines and then lease them, reserving the privilege of taking the coal at a low price, that we could probably make a commercial arrangement which would prove beneficial. It might possibly be suggested why, if this is so valuable a mine, it is not taken up by somebody besides the Government? Why should the Government go in and expend $50,000 and lease it to somebody else? Why does not that somebody go in and buy it from the persons who now have it? Of course they can not buy it because we have an option which we paid something for, but if we give it up, somebody, perhaps, will go in; I do not know whether they will or not. I have an offer from Scott, the man who builds the ironclads in San Francisco.

He was in the islands and came back with us on the Korea this last trip. He sent me a written proposition which I will be glad to send to the committee if they would like to see it. They have got to send their people down there to make an investigation and be sure that what Lieutenant Wigmore states is true before they want to go into it.

Now, the Government of the United States on the testimony of Secretary Taft alone proposes by this bill to go on and pay $50,000 for this coal land, on the judgment of Wigmore, which Mr. Taft says Mr. Scott or private parties would not accept. What is the quality of the coal which has been extracted as a result of the prospecting which Mr. Wigmore has done, for there has been no development of this mine? Let me read what Admiral Manney said to the Committee on Appropriations:

Mr. LITTAUER. Has your Bureau or the Navy Department had their attention attracted to the coal on the island of Batan in the Philippines?

Admiral MANNEY. Yes; not officially. I know that it has been discovered there, and I have seen reports as to its character.

Mr. LITTAUER. No examination has been made as to whether or not its character would be fit for naval vessels?

Admiral MANNEY. Yes; and it has been reported against, but I would not lay much stress on that because the mines are not developed.

Mark you, we are not buying a mine, we are buying prospects, prospects which private individuals themselves would not invest a dollar in until they have made further investigation than the investigation made by the Government officials.

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. Does this coal come to the water's edge on the proposed purchase?

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand it does.

Mr. LACEY. What is there to hinder those owners from excavating it the same as they would in Pennsylvania, putting it on barges, or sloops, and carrying it to Manila and selling it at the high price that prevails there for coal?

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not know of any other market for that kind of coal.

Mr. LACEY. Then the fact that for the last fifteen or twenty years they have not mined this coal seems to be a circumstance against it?

Mr. TAWNEY. Pretty good evidence it was not good for anything.

Mr. GROSVENOR. What would they buy coal for in Manila?

Mr. TAWNEY. Let me continue with Admiral Manney's statement:

There have been nothing but croppings that have been tried, and it is only fair to presume that it is the same kind of coal that is found in Borneo and on the China coast and in Japan, north of us.

Mr. LITTAUER. None of those coals are properly fitted for naval use?

Admiral MANNEY. They are not. The Russians have vast coal mines at their disposal, yet they buy Welsh coal and ship it out there. You can get more speed and more steam; it is better coal.

Again, on page 272, Hearings Committee on Appropriations, Admiral Manney says:

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. If such an investigation had been made and it had been determined that the coal found in the Philippines was suitable for the use of this Government, would you have known of it?

Admiral MANNEY. Probably, unless it was made by the Army. The coal which has been taken from the croppings of the mines in the Philippines has been tested on board of our vessels in a practical way, and some of it has been analyzed chemically. That was considered not worth using. My own opinion is that those mines, like every other mine, would improve by being worked, but unless the mine is worked it is impossible to say what the value of the coal is.

My Bureau has a large book called "Efficiency of Coals," in which there is an entry made of every coal that is tested, and they have tested coal from mines all through the East and some from abroad—the chemical test and the boiler test. Many of them have been tested many times. We keep that for reference.

Every coal of any consequence that is discovered anywhere in the world is tested by our Navy Department. This coal has been tested and it has been found to be worthless for use in the Navy, and inasmuch as that is the principal use, or our Navy is the principal consumer of coal in the Philippine Islands, the judgment of the Committee on Appropriations was that it was not worth while embarking on an enterprise of this kind. We felt confident also of another fact, and that is that when we took this second step in the matter of the ownership and control of coal lands in the Philippine Islands, the first step having been taken by the War Department without authority of law, and paid for out of the appropriation for the transportation of the Army; now, when we took this second step, the actual operation of these coal mines on the island of Batan would be the third and final step. Why? They will come back to us and say we now own this concession and we have endeavored to get private capital to go in there and develop these mines, but have failed. This land is capable of producing hundreds and thousands and millions of tons of coal, we are consuming 200,000 tons of coal annually in the Philippine Islands, therefore in order to save this enormous amount to the Government we must have an appropriation to enable the Government to operate these mines. If we go into the coal business in the Philippine Islands there will be other private enterprises demanding appropriations for similar development.

Mr. WILLIAMS rose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I want to ask the gentleman if he really thinks there would be any trouble in the United States, owning the land as an owner as well as a Government, in leasing the coal lands to people who would operate them so our Navy could get its coal from those lands, and leasing them at a right good figure, too?

Mr. TAWNEY. If they were leased, according to the testimony of Admiral Manney, the Navy would not consume the coal, because the test has proven that that coal was worthless, and it would not, therefore, be used. Why, during the Japanese war the Japanese navy secured their coal from Wales. They did not use their own coal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The gentleman was just making an argument that we would be compelled to buy coal. That is the object of my question.

Mr. TAWNEY. I do not say we would be compelled, but I say that if we took this step, then the War Department will come here saying that we have already engaged in the operation and ask for an appropriation to go into the business of mining this coal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, another question, in consequence of your getting off the immediate subject in your reply. Is not the evidence abundant that while this is not the coal we would want to use in time of peace, when we could get better coal from the United States, it is better coal than we can get in time of war from enywhere else out there?

Mr. TAWNEY. I will answer the gentleman's question by——

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is the testimony before the Committee on Insular Affairs. The testimony states that while it is not the best of coal, it could be used for that purpose in time of necessity.

Mr. TAWNEY. I will read from the report of the hearings before the Committee on Appropriations, as follows:

Mr. BRUNDIDGE. I think we have some information that there were sufficient tests made of this coal produced in the Philippine Islands, showing that the veins were 18 feet wide and that several hundred tons had been already taken out and are now there.

Admiral MANNEY. I have heard of that, and I have known that they have secured the control, but they will have to go deeper to ascertain the quality of the coal. Whenever the Bureau hears or knows of any coal we immediately test it. All we require is for them to send us 5 pounds for an analytical test; that is invariable, because we are as anxious to get good coal as anybody else. Then, if the test warrants it, we will take 5 tons for a boiler test, and that is tabulated and put in our book of coal efficients, which I will be pleased to send to the committee.

They say that the Government of the United States owns the island of Batan. Our information is altogether to the contrary, except in so far as it owns the Philippine Islands. It is under the control of the Philippine government, but we have there a 5-mile-square Government reservation which is underlaid, they say, with coal.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. Is that anywhere near this present piece?

Mr. TAWNEY. It is contiguous to this present piece.

Mr. WM. ALDEN SMITH. And away from the sea?

Mr. TAWNEY. Not away from the sea, but it is off on one side of this harbor. And right there let me say that Lieutenant

Wigmore himself admitted that we could gain access to our own reservation from the harbor without this reservation, provided we built a road up around the Spanish concession which it is proposed to purchase.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I want to ask the gentleman this question: A few moments ago he said that Mr. Scott, who I believe is a shipbuilder in San Francisco, would not make an offer to buy this coal property until he sent his men and had it examined. Did he know that Lieutenant Wigmore had made this examination?

Mr. TAWNEY. He knew all about it, and Lieutenant Wigmore went to him and advised with him. In fact, Mr. Taft says in his testimony here that Mr. Scott returned from the Philippine Islands with him last summer on the Korea. Mr. Scott was fully advised of the investigation which the Government had made and of the result of that investigation, and yet Mr. Taft says Mr. Scott declined to enter upon the enterprise or take a lease of it until they had satisfied themselves that the examination, or the result of the examination as shown by Lieutenant Wigmore, was correct.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Now, then, who is Mr. Scott, and what is his business?

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Scott is president of the Union Iron Works, of San Francisco.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. And he has to purchase coal to conduct his affairs?

Mr. TAWNEY. He purchases coal.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Does not the gentleman value his opinion very highly in this matter as a business man?

Mr. TAWNEY. Why, I would value his opinion if he had made an investigation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. I mean his judgment.

Mr. TAWNEY. But he has not made an investigation, and his judgment is that he would not invest a dollar in this enterprise on the report of the Government engineer or of Lieutenant Wigmore, who has made the investigation.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. Has Mr. Scott been down himself to see this coal land?

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not answer that question.

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman states that a railroad could be constructed from the harbor to the coal fields on that island reserved by the Federal Government. Can the gentleman state how long that road would have to be or what the probable cost would be?

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not. Lieutenant Wigmore said it was practicable.

Mr. HAMILTON. Would we have to obtain a right of way from the Spanish owners of the lands adjoining the harbor?

Mr. TAWNEY. I can not answer that question.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. What was Secretary Taft's advice before the gentleman's committee as to closing the option?

Mr. GROSVENOR. There is no surface upon which a railroad can be built there. It is almost, as I understand it, a perpendicular mountain.

Mr. TAWNEY. I know nothing about the conditions.

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman stated we could obtain a right of way.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Your right of way would have to go through the mountains—through the land that is held under this option.

Mr. HAMILTON. The gentleman from Minnesota just stated we could have a right of way across the Spanish claim.

Mr. OLMSTED rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Minnesota yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. TAWNEY. Certainly.

Mr. OLMSTED. Assuming that the Government had a military reservation, as the gentleman stated, of 5 miles square, and there lies between that reservation and the harbor a tract of land rendering the reservation inaccessible from the harbor, would he or would he not think it good business for the Government to acquire that, even if it did not have an ounce of coal in it?

Mr. TAWNEY. In answer to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, I would say that we will have to first determine whether or not we want to go into the coal business, to determine whether or not we should own this option or not.

Now, if you want to embark in the business of developing a coal mine in the Philippine Islands, and make that a Government proposition, then I say you want to own this option. But I say that that proposition necessarily follows this one, that when you have purchased these coal lands and are unable to lease them, then to obtain the coal the Government must enter upon the business of operating its coal mines.

Mr. OLMSTED. Let me call the gentleman's attention to this statement of Secretary Taft:

> On investigation it turned out that two or three Spaniards who had these valid claims under the Spanish mining law had taken up all the claims which lay immediately along the harbor and had pushed back, so to speak, the Government ownership beyond the line of hills or mountains and made impossible access to the harbor from the claims which the Government could establish or reserve.

Is it not a good business proposition to get that intervening strip out of the way, without any reference to the coal?

Mr. TAWNEY. That depends altogether upon the proposition whether we want to embark on the enterprise of operating coal mines.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I regard the bill before the House as one of great importance and great merit. Gentlemen may talk about the inadvisability of our entering upon the business of mining coal, as though the conditions in the Philippine Islands were the same substantially as here. I take it that but very few Members of this House are in favor of the Government entering upon any business not absolutely necessary for the security of the Government, or in any business where individual enterprise can meet the demands of the people and of the Government. We have 7,500 miles away from our continent a group of islands; they are very near the coast of China.

The question whether we will retain permanent control of them or not has nothing to do with this question. No matter whether we shall finally give them up or not, there is not a man in the United States, in my judgment, who will not be in favor of retaining at least a coaling and naval station there. I contend, so far as I am individually concerned, speaking for myself only—I am willing to say that, in my judgment, we will never give those islands up. They will be a part of the United States as long as any of us live. [Applause.] But that question is not involved. When I was in the Philippine Islands last, I made some investigation into this coal business—not as to where it was located, but as to the price. At that time Japanese coal of the poorest quality was sold for $8 a ton. I was told it cost at least $12 a ton to purchase and take coal from Vancouver Island, the most accessible point on this continent, to the Philippine Islands; $12 a ton to lay it down at Manila. The Government of the United States is a purchaser of coal in Manila for Army transports and for the Navy. The time may come in the near future when this Government will be in a bad shape if it can not provide itself with coal for its war vessels and Army transports. It would be better, in my judgment, for this Government to secure a much better quality of coal than can possibly be purchased in Japan at less than one-half of the cost if it is purchased from Japan.

Mr. KEIFER. But suppose Japan would not be willing to sell?

Mr. HULL. The gentleman from Ohio suggests to me that Japan would not be willing to sell coal. I am hardly willing to believe that it would not be willing to sell the coal, but it is the part of wisdom for the safety of this Government in these far-away possessions to protect itself at every point, so that no matter what the future will bring to us we can stand up and defend our rights and not be compelled to depend upon any other country to maintain our power. I hope the bill will pass.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE].

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I believe that our friends of the Committee on Appropriations, in their most commendable zeal to compel the Departments to hold their payments down to the appropriations made by Congress, have been misled in their judgment in this matter. They started out by stating that perhaps the War Department had spent $40,000 improperly in exploring these coal lands, and after that the chairman finally closed up by insisting that if this $50,000 were appropriated we would go into all sorts of useless expenditures recommended by this Department and the other Departments in the business affairs of this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think that this bill ought to pass. Two or three years ago we found that there was this coal land and this Spanish concession. The Department went in to explore it and see what was there. Like wise business men the first thing they did was to get this option on the Spanish concession for $50,000. They were wise to do that before they made the exploration. They got that, and have continued it down so that it expires on the first of next month.

They then went to work and made the exploration in the usual manner made by experts who want to explore mines. They had a man there for more than two years, Lieutenant Wigmore, whom I had the pleasure of meeting last summer. I heard from him a full account of the exploration he made there. He said that there was no doubt that there was coal sufficient to run the islands for all their inland transportation and for the use of our transports and all the uses of the Government there for at least two or three hundred years. He said it was a good deal better coal than they could get in Japan, and we use Japanese coal for our transports now. It is used by the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, and by all the other lines having steamers running from this country to Japan. He said it was fully equal to any coal they had found in Australia, and up to this time Australian coal is the best that has been found in the Orient.

Here was this concession between the harbor and the rest of the coal. Owning the whole island, we own all the coal in the island except that covered by this concession of 300 acres. It was found to be a legal concession. It has been examined by good lawyers and there is no question of that. We can get it for $50,000. Would a good business man hesitate for a moment to get this concession?

Mr. TAWNEY. They have hesitated for fifteen years.

Mr. PAYNE. They have not had the $40,000 that was necessary to make the exploration. Money is not as plentiful in the islands as it is in the United States. People are not down there ready to put $40,000 into such a venture as that. The Government had to do it. They have developed it, and of course these men are not fools. When the 1st of March comes around, knowing what the Government has found, this concession, of course, will be worth three or four hundred thousand dollars, and no one will get it for less.

The gentleman says that Mr. Scott said he wanted to investigate. What man is there who would put a million dollars into a project to develop a coal mine who would not want to make an investigation to verify the Government investigation?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. Now, it is not proposed that the Government go on and open a coal mine and run the coal business. The extract read from the testimony of Secretary Taft by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] proved the contrary of that. They do not propose that the Government shall go into the coal business. How were they to go into it? The report of the committee says that there is already an offer of a lease; that if the Government of the United States gets this concession, which now belongs to these Spanish gentlemen, there are people who will go in and open up this mine and furnish to the Government of the United States the coal they need at the cost of mining, which is supposed to be about $2 per ton, and a 10 per cent additional profit upon it. The rest of the coal they will mine for themselves. That proposition will give to the Government the coal for which it is now paying $5 a ton for about $2 a ton, or rather the Government will get a superior quality of coal. It is a proposition that pays for all the expense in a single year.

I was talking the other day to a gentleman from Pennsylvania, a large owner of coal mines, and he asked me about this proposition. I told him what Lieutenant Wigmore had said. "Why," said he, "if Congress appropriates this money and takes back this concession, I will go with some friends out there next summer and investigate this and bid upon it and see if I can not make a lease with the Government of the United States."

People will be anxious to go into it if we only have common sense enough and business sense enough to-day to vote this $50,000 and open the gateway from this deep harbor into this mine. There is not a better proposition in the Orient for coal than there is right here. Shall we let it pass? Shall our friends on the Appropriations Committee prevent us from doing this thing, which seems to be just and right and fair and a good business proposition?

Mr. Speaker, I think it is most important that Congress should pass this bill now in order that this option may be wiped out by the 1st of March.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin has nine minutes remaining.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I yield two minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. MCKINLAY].

Mr. McKINLAY of California. Mr. Speaker, I think there is a little misapprehension in regard to the parties who want to sell these claims and the parties who want to buy. For over two years the Government has had an option on these coal lands. In these two years it was not possible for any other buyer to step in and acquire title to these lands. The option expires about the 1st of March. In view of the developments in the islands since the Government took the option, after the 1st of March the price will be fully three or four hundred thousand dollars instead of $50,000. The Government of the United States is the only party that can buy these lands for $50,000. That is the reason why private parties can not step in and get them for $50,000. There is no doubt but that private parties from all parts of the Union would be anxious enough to buy the option and take it off the hands of the Government for $50,000. The advantage to the Government is that when they pay this price they have control of the harbor, they have an entry to their own coal lands, and in addition to that they will be able to make a lease so advantageous that they themselves will be able to secure coal so cheap as to make a saving to the Government of $200,000 a year for the American transports and the Government coal consumers of the Philippine Islands.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, in connection with what the gentleman from California has just said, I wish to call attention to the testimony of Lieutenant Wigmore. Lieutenant Wigmore said that Admiral Manny told him that the battle ships of the United States would not use this coal. But the testimony is undisputed that the transports, coast-guard vessels, and launches, and the ice plant at Manila, and other Government consumers of coal, taking an aggregate of 200,000 tons a year, would use it. They pay now $5 a ton for coal. As I said before, it is hoped if we get control of these claims and thus of the whole island, that the Government of the United States will be able to make a contract whereby it and the Philippine government, for purely governmental purposes, may get coal at an outside cost of not more than $2 or $2.20 a ton.

But the bill as reported does not include any proposition of this kind, nor any proposition to lease these lands.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] put up a man of straw and then knocked him down, as did also the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] when they both denounced the proposition to have the Government lease these lands, and declared that we are about entering on governmental ownership of coal mines.

Let us see the absurdity of that contention. This bill proposes simply to buy up the claims of some Spaniards which have been held there since 1890. By the way, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] characterized these as "doubtful claims," although, as I said, so fine a lawyer as Secretary Taft testified that the claims are of unquestioned validity.

According to the undisputed testimony, these claims control the access to this harbor, the only harbor on the island. Now, then, after we shall have simply purchased these claims, and that is all the bill proposes to do, how will we have entered upon government ownership and working of coal mines? Suppose that we owned these claims this minute, would we be working Government coal mines? Mr. Speaker, before the Government could itself enter upon the working of coal mines there would have to be another bill come before the House embodying that proposition, and before it could lease these lands authority must be granted in another measure.

Mr. TAWNEY. It was embodied in the bill as the gentleman introduced it.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The bill, as introduced, the gentleman must know, is not the bill that we propose to pass here.

Mr. TAWNEY. I understand that, but it shows the relation of the development of the property to the purchase; it shows how close we are up against the proposition.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I have never been able to understand that spurious kind of logic which holds that because I am in favor of one good proposition that therefore I am of necessity bound to support anything else which may subsequently be presented to the House. There is only one proposition now before the House, and it is a good one, namely, to buy up these Spanish claims, the validity of which Secretary Taft says is indisputable, claims which block access to our own coal lands from the only harbor in the island.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] ask why have not these claims been worked by the Spaniards? They have been worked. They had twenty-two or twenty-three men there who got out some coal, which was sold for from $7 to $7.50 a ton. That is the way the Spaniards worked the claim. There had never been any great demand for coal in those islands until we went there. Our transports, our ice plant in Manila, our coast-guard service, and Government launches have made a demand for coal that did not exist until within the last four or five years.

Admiral Manney has been quoted as saying that this coal is worthless for naval purposes. His testimony related to battle ships and cruisers that want coal of fine quality, such as we produce in the United States, in order to generate sufficient heat to speed rapidly. But the testimony is all one way that this Batan coal is good for our transports and for our coast-guard ships in the Philippines, and the testimony of Mr. Wigmore, an expert, is that a single one of our transports could save $2,000 on a trip if it could go to Batan and load at the wharf instead of going to Nagasaki and paying $5 a ton for Japanese coal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. TAWNEY. Well, Mr. Speaker, had the bill better not be read first?

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. There is one amendment which I propose, Mr. Speaker. It is an amendment to the title.

Mr. PAYNE. Has the bill been read?

Mr. TAWNEY. No.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to purchase the coal claims owned by Messers. Munoz and Villanueva, lying on the island of Batan, Philippine Islands, and upon which the War Department now holds an option; and to provide for the purchase of said claims the sum of $50,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and the above sum is made immediately available in order that purchase may be made before the said option expires, to wit, before March 1, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to lease the land included in the said claim, together with all or any portion of the land included, or hereinafter to be included, in the Batan Military Reservation, for a term of not more than fifty years, for coal-mining purposes: Provided, That the Governments of the United States and the Philippine Islands will thereby secure the right to purchase such coal as they may desire at a price not exceeding 10 per cent above the cost price of said coal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Also the following amendment:

On page 2 strike out all of section 2.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment striking out the section.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now report the committee amendment to the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to provide for the purchase of certain coal claims in the island of Batan, in the Philippine Islands, and for the purpose of securing a local coal supply to the Government of the United States and to the government of the Philippine Islands."

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, I offer as an amendment a substitute to that, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to provide for the purchase of certain coal claims in the island of Batan, in the Philippine Islands."

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read a third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TAWNEY) there were—ayes 121, noes 36.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Speaker, I present the conference report on the bill (H. R. 12320) to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes; which I ask to have printed in the RECORD under the rules.

The SPEAKER. The conference report will be printed under the rules.

LAKE ERIE AND OHIO RIVER SHIP CANAL.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following motion, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DALZELL moves to suspend the rules and make it in order to consider H. R. 14396, a bill to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, etc., at any time after the completion of the consideration of the military appropriation bill.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, this is simply a motion to fix a time—not for the consideration of the bill now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Where does this resolution come from?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. DALZELL. I offer a resolution to suspend the rules and fix a time for the consideration of this bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Which bill is this? This canal bill?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. From the Lakes down to Pittsburg?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why is it necessary to offer a resolution?

Mr. DALZELL. I want to fix a time for consideration—not now, but some time in the future.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What date has the gentleman fixed?

Mr. DALZELL. After the disposition of the military appropriation bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then as to parliamentary rights, everything is left in statu quo?

Mr. DALZELL. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The right to call for a second and the right to the usual debate if a second is called for?

Mr. DALZELL. Everything under the rules.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Why not proceed to the consideration of this matter now? We have a pretty full House.

Mr. DALZELL. There are others who have been promised recognition to-day, and I do not care to shut them out.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, upon this bill I believe I will raise the question of consideration.

Mr. DALZELL. I think the gentleman from Mississippi does not understand the situation. It is a motion to suspend the rules and fix a time for the consideration of the bill. It involves no consideration of the bill now.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, the point is whether you have fixed a day certain——

Mr. DALZELL. After consideration of the military appropriation bill, to be considered under the rules.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, a parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I desire to demand a second, is it necessary that I should demand it now, or if I allow this to go through will that right be cut off?

Mr. DALZELL. When this bill comes to be considered it is considered in the House like any other bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But your resolution is to suspend the rules, is it not?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If, instead of having introduced this resolution to suspend the rules, you had gone along in the regular course, I could have demanded a second?

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I demand a second now, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the motion so the House will understand it. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to suspend the rules and make it in order to consider the bill, namely, a bill to incorporate the Lake Erie and Ohio River Ship Canal, etc., at any time after the completion of the consideration of the military appropriation bill. Now, on the motion to suspend the rules the gentleman from Mississippi can demand a second if he desires.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If I do not demand a second now, will I not lose the opportunity to demand a second at all?

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. WILLIAMS. With that understanding I shall not demand a second now, but I understood if this passed the rules will be suspended and then I would not have a chance to demand a second.

The SPEAKER. Not at all.

Mr. GAINES of Tennessee. What is the purpose of this?

Mr. DALZELL. To fix a day; that is all.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Speaker, I would like to raise the question of order on this resolution submitted.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. DE ARMOND. I wish to raise the question of order. The question of order is that this falls under the rules and ought to go to the Committee on Rules, because it provides for precisely the same condition of things that exists when a measure is reported from the Committee on Rules. Suspension day is to dispose of things, not to provide for their disposal at some other time, and this is really in effect a special rule without having been referred to the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Missouri that his point of order, in the opinion of the Chair, is not well taken. This is one of the Mondays in the month when it is in order to move to suspend the rules and do anything where a Member is recognized, provided two-thirds of the Members vote for the motion. Now, then, upon that motion, if a second is waived there is twenty minutes' debate, but upon this particular motion it is not to pass a bill, but it is to fix any time after the Army appropriation bill is passed for its consideration. In other words, under the rules, the gentleman, at any time after the consideration of the Army appropriation bill has been completed, could call up this matter, and would be entitled to call it up, and then it would be for a majority of the House to determine whether they would consider it or whether they would consider something else.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BURNETT. It would not require two-thirds of the House, then, to pass the bill?

The SPEAKER. No; it would pass just as any other bill would.

Mr. BURNETT. Then I demand a second.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] asks unanimous consent that a second may be considered as ordered. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] is entitled to twenty minutes and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] to twenty minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to occupy any time. All I have to say is embodied in my proposition. I have made a motion to suspend the rules and fix a time for the consideration of a bill that has already been reported by a committee of this House, namely, the Committee on Railways and Canals. If this resolution shall pass, then I shall be in a position to call up that bill at the time named in the resolution, to wit, after the disposition of the appropriation bill from the Committee on Military Affairs, and then the bill will be considered under the rules of the House, just like any other bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And, if it receives a majority vote, will pass.

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Instead of a two-thirds vote.

Mr. DALZELL. Certainly. I have not anything more to say. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman to explain the bill. What is the object of it?

Mr. DALZELL. The object of the bill is to create a corporation to construct a canal from a point on Lake Erie to a point on the Ohio River, in the neighborhood of Pittsburg, through the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio, not at the public expense, but as a result of private enterprise.

Mr. SIMS. A private corporation?

Mr. BURLESON. Why is it that the State of Pennsylvania can not incorporate the company?

Mr. DALZELL. The State of Pennsylvania can incorporate it and the State of Ohio can incorporate it, but there is no provision by either State for a consolidation of the two companies. Besides, this is a project which it is estimated will cost about $35,000,000, and the parties who have it in charge and who are willing to undertake it, think it necessary to have a Federal charter in order to finance the enterprise. The bill as reported from the committee protects the interests of the public and the interests of the stockholders in the most drastic way possible.

Mr. BURLESON. I would like to ask the gentleman if ultimately this company is to ask the Government to take hold of this enterprise?

Mr. DALZELL. The provision is that the Government at the end of fifty years may at its option appropriate the canal, not paying anything for the franchise or for the good will.

Mr. BURLESON. Those interests have no purpose before that time to compel the Federal Government to appropriate the canal?

Mr. DALZELL. Not at all. It is postponed for fifty years. I feel persuaded if I had an opportunity to argue the question before this House that there would be no trouble about passing the bill. That is the reason I want to have a time fixed for the consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] reserve the remainder of his time?

Mr. DALZELL. I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish this bill was on the desk of every Member present, because I think it is one of the most vicious pieces of legislation, as a precedent, that I have seen offered in this House for some time. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURLESON] well asked why they could not go to the States to get their charter for this corporation. One of the objections I have to the passage of the bill is that it will be setting a precedent here of Congress granting charters to these private corporations. There is no doubt that in the past in some cases that has been done, notably in the cases of the Pacific railway companies, but the Supreme Court in passing upon that question stated that one of the reasons why that was done was because those railroads passed through Territories and over navigable streams and across many great States. Here it is sought to commit Congress and this Government to the enactment of legislation which hereafter railroad companies may take as a precedent, as well as every canal company and every electric railway company that wants to cross State lines and escape control by State laws.

The gentlemen who were before the Committee on Railways and Canals in favor of this bill admitted that they could get from the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio all the powers they wanted except the right of merger; that is, the right of consolidation. Now, there are companies and corporations all over this country whose lines run across State lines which have gone to the States and gotten all the powers they ought to have had. I desire to especially call the attention of gentlemen from these two States of Pennsylvania and Ohio to what powers this corporation is to have under this bill. It not only grants to them, Mr. Speaker, the right of eminent domain, but if you will look at sections 11 and 12 you will find it grants to them the right of absorbing every stream that they cross, of absolutely destroying the electric-light plants and gas plants and things of that kind that are kept up by the cities and towns for their use, when they pay the value of said utilities. It may destroy a man's mill that is below on any streams the canal may cross. It may be said that they will have to condemn them and the owners will get compensation for them; but in a case where a man's mill is away below where the stream has been absorbed by the canal, how is a man going to secure damage for that? If he goes before the court, it will declare the damages were too remote and can not be allowed. I want to read section 11, which affords a precedent, in my opinion, for very vicious legislation:

SEC. 11. That the said company, in the exercise of its right of eminent domain as granted in section 2 of this act, may enter upon and take such lands as are necessary and proper for the making, maintaining, and operating of the canals and other works of the company hereby authorized, and it shall have the authority to alter any and all highways, railroads, and other works, either public or private, necessary for the making, maintaining, and operating of the canals and other works of the company, and whenever in the making, maintaining, and operating of the canals and other works of the company it shall be necessary to alter any highway, railroad, or other works, either public or private, and the said canal company and the owners of such highway, railroad, or other works can not agree as to the character, method, and terms of such alteration, and there are no laws of the State in which the alteration is proposed applicable thereto, then the same shall be determined by the district court of the United States of the district in which the alteration is proposed, and the district courts of the United States in the district through which the canal herein authorized shall run are hereby clothed with jurisdiction to hear and determine such disputes, under such rules as said courts may prescribe, and to fix the character, method, and terms upon which the alteration shall be made.

That is one of the very outrageous propositions involved in this. Section 12 is, if possible, more so:

SEC. 12. That the said company, in the exercise of its right of eminent domain as granted in section 2 of this act, may obtain, take, and use, for the construction and operation of the said canal, from the rivers, lakes, brooks, streams, water courses, ponds, reservoirs, and other sources of water supply, sufficient water for the purpose of constructing, maintaining, operating, and using the said canals and works hereby authorized; control and regulate the flood waters of the—rivers that are named in section 12. The only limitation is the proviso which says that they can not diminish the water supply of any city, village, or municipality below the reasonable requirements of such city, village, or municipality, or in any manner pollute the same.

Now, as I said a moment ago, they can absorb every stream running every mill below that. They can alter the railroads, Mr. Speaker, they can pull them up and move them. The proposition embraced in the bill is that it is a matter of higher public utility, and it can destroy the other public utilities; and if the Congress of the United States decides to pass this bill, it will decide that this is a greater public utility than the other utilities along the banks of the canal and that they can be destroyed wherever the canal is to be dug.

Section 13 is little better than the other sections I have called attention to. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that we are entering upon a field here that we do not want to go any further into. In these two States they have canal commissions. They regulate a great many things, and there is nothing but this power of combination that this private corporation pretends that it could not get from the jurisdiction of the State laws. I have not time to discuss that further, and I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]. [Loud applause.]

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, how much time is there left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has fourteen minutes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, I hope that nobody will get it into his head that there is anything in the slightest degree of a political or partisan character about this bill just because I, who oppose it, am minority leader. I want every Republican in the House to look at it as it is, as a purely business matter. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] says that the only object of the resolution is "to get consideration of this bill upon its merits." There is another object of the resolution, that is to come in upon suspension day, and by resolution to get out from under the rules that require a two-thirds vote to pass a bill, and enable this bill to be passed, if this resolution is passed, by a majority vote upon some succeeding occasion.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman is certainly mistaken, and does not want to misrepresent me. I am not bound to call up this bill on suspension day and ask for its passage by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS. In response to a parliamentary inquiry by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT], the Speaker said that when this matter came up, if this resolution were passed, the bill could be passed by a majority vote.

Mr. DALZELL. Why, certainly; like any other bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If it came up to-day it could not be passed except by a two-thirds vote.

Mr. DALZELL. I did not call it up to-day.

Mr. WILLIAMS. You do virtually call it up. You take advantage of the fact that this is suspension day, to be recognized by the Chair.

But leave that out. I want to talk about this bill upon its merits. It is absolutely wrong, gentlemen, upon general principles. If a canal ought to be dug—and I will say right here that one ought to be dug from the Lakes down to the navigable waters of the Ohio, putting the lower Mississippi Valley and the Lakes in communication with one another—it ought to be done in the regular manner. It ought to come upon a river and harbor bill. It ought to be paid for out of the Public Treasury. The canal ought to be at the service of all the people. There either ought to be no tolls upon it at all, or there ought to be tolls so low as merely to pay the cost of operation, and not tolls sufficient to pay interest upon an immense amount of money invested in the plant, and tolls besides that to pay a dividend to stockholders in a private corporation, and other tolls for officers of the corporation whose members are not stated and whose salaries are not prescribed in the bill.

If you want canals dug and rivers and harbors deepened, in the interest of the people and of interstate commerce, those things ought to be done by the Federal Government, and they ought to be operated at the very cheapest possible cost, so as to have the very utmost possible influence in keeping down freight rates throughout the United States. The precedent is wrong. Why, they say that here is an immense commerce. Turn to page 5 of the report and you will find the statistics there. The figures are astonishing of the amount of iron ore, the amount of pig iron, and the amount of coal that would come down that canal. All the more reason not to give it to any private corporation to exploit the people. Turn to the savings to commerce, on page 7 of the report. They are equally astonishing. They say the canal tolls would be 20 cents per ton, although there is not a word in this bill to force them to charge only 20 cents per ton.

Mr. DALZELL. The gentleman has not read the bill, I fear.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have read the bill, but I may have made a mistake.

Mr. DALZELL. The tolls so far as intrastate commerce are concerned are left to be regulated by the State legislatures, and so far as interstate commerce is concerned they are to be regulated by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I understand that; but upon page 7 of the report I find the expected canal tolls are put at 20 cents per ton. Now, I say there is not a word in the bill to compel this private corporation not to charge a higher rate than 20 cents a ton. There is no restriction upon its right to charge, except that as to interstate shipments it is to be under the general control of the Interstate Commerce Commission, and as to intrastate tolls it is put under the laws of the respective States, Ohio and Pennsylvania. We all know how little all that amounts to in the present state of the law.

The estimated canal tolls here are put at 20 cents per ton, and the vessel charges at 20 cents per ton, making a total of 40 cents per ton. The present railroad rate is 90 cents. The first two put together and substracted from the last make an estimated saving of 50 cents per ton below the present railroad rates. And yet whether there shall be this saving or not or any saving at all is left to the sweet will of the canal company. If that canal company can pay the interest upon the money invested in the plant and pay a dividend to its stockholders, and charge only 20 cents a ton, then, if the Government of the United States builds this canal, as it ought to do, it can certainly pay operating expenses—all it would have to provide for—on from 5 to 10 cents a ton.

What is the object of public works of this sort? The object is to keep down railroad freight rates by the competition of waterways, and that ought to be the object of this project.

It would be the result, if the War Department under a river and harbor bill appropriation constructed the work.

It will not be the result if the power to construct and to collect unprescribed tolls is delegated to a corporation, which may charge railroad rates or sell to a railroad or a combination of railroads.

Mr. SHERLEY. I want to ask the gentleman at what period of time he thinks we will get this canal built by the Government, judging by the present expenditure for rivers and harbors? I ask that question because I am interested in the object sought to be attained by this bill.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not know when, I am sorry to say. We have "gone, gone, gone" a world-powering, and hence we have got to the point where, threatened with deficits, we must delegate river and harbor work to private corporations in the United States. [Applause.]

But I say the thing to do is to build this canal by the Government, and I say it ought to be built by the Government. I say that the river and harbor appropriation bill ought to provide for it. It is of the very greatest advantage to the lower Mississippi River. It is of the greatest advantage to all the industries about Pittsburg and upon the Lakes. It is of the very greatest advantage to everybody distant from there, as a regulator of railway freight rates. But the principle of delegating these great governmental functions to this private corporation is wrong. And then the principle—even if it was going to be delegated—the principle of coming to the United States Government for a charter instead of getting a charter from either the State of Pennsylvania or the State of Ohio is wrong. What does it lead to? Now, I have only a minute, and I am compelled to speak very rapidly and not very clearly, but after enumerating the powers of this corporation in the bill, this significant sentence is added:

> And generally have—
> Mr. Speaker, watch this language—> and exercise all the powers usually granted to and vested in corporations of the United States of America.

Will any lawyer here tell me what powers are usually granted to and vested in "corporations of the United States of America?" I can tell you what powers are usually granted and vested in corporations of the State of Mississippi, and other gentlemen can tell you what powers are granted to and vested in corporations of the State of Pennsylvania. But "corporations of the United States!" What are they? What are their usual powers? Who knows? But here we are out on a wide, wide sea when you come to the Federal charter business.

Mr. GARRETT. Let me ask the gentleman from Mississippi if this corporation would be exempt from State taxation?

Mr. WILLIAMS. It could be, but the bill does not exempt it. Now, gentlemen, I want to call your attention to this provision: Section 11—watch the language—the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BURNETT] read it, but I want you to take it in and absorb it:

> That the said company, in the exercise of its right of eminent domain as granted in section 2 of this act, may enter upon and take such lands as are necessary and proper for the making, maintaining, and operating of the canals and other works of the company hereby authorized, and it shall have the authority to alter any and all highways, railroads, and other works, either public or private, necessary for the making, maintaining, and operating of the canals and other works of the company.

To "alter" highways, railroads, and "other works"—how broad; "public or private"—how broader!

Mr. BURNETT. I desire to state to the gentleman from Mississippi that I have followed the bill for several days, and they have actually changed the majority of the names of the incorporators. This time they are not what they were before.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Proof probable that something concealed is behind it all, with decoys in front. But I do not know who they are. They may be the best people in the world, and have the highest and most patriotic motives. But the whole principle is wrong. This doing of a public work by private corporations, and leaving the private corporations under the indefinite general restrictions of law as to "reasonable charges," to charge what they please to travel over the canal highway is all wrong—a retrograde step to old methods.

Now, later on in section 11, in lines 4, 5, 6, and 7, on page 7, the bill says:

> And whenever in the making, maintaining, and operating of the canals and other works of the company it shall be necessary to alter any highway, railroad, or other works, either public or private, and the said canal company and the owners of such highway, railroad, or other works can not agree as to the character, method, and terms of such alteration, and there are no laws of the State in which the alteration is proposed applicable thereto, then the same shall be determined by the district court of the United States.

So that they are to operate within the State in condemnation of property in the very absence of State law and independently of it to go into the Federal courts.

Mr. BURNETT. If the gentleman will allow me one more interruption, it was also stated in the hearings that this company had a charter from Pennsylvania and also from the State of Ohio.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes; and they are getting this power to operate by going into the district Federal courts. What need have they for another charter? One from either State would do.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield for a question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. In view of what the gentleman from Mississippi has just said I recall the terrific struggle the Wabash Railroad had to get into Pittsburg at all. Does the gentleman know whether the incorporators under this bill would have an opportunity to cripple or prevent the entrance into the city of Pittsburg by the Wabash Railroad or any other?

Mr. WILLIAMS. If they wanted to, they would have the right "to alter"—that is a pretty broad word—"any highway or railroad where they thought it was necessary for the making and maintaining and operating of the canal;" and not only for that, but where they thought it was necessary for the making and maintaining and operating of "other works of the company," whatever they are.

And whenever in the making, maintaining, and operating of the canals and other works of the company it shall be necessary to alter any highway, railroad, or other works, either public or private, they can go into the Federal courts.

This is broad enough to keep anything out of anywhere.

Now, section 14 says:

That the said company may take, use, occupy, and hold, but not alienate, so much of the public beach or beach road, or lands covered with the waters of the rivers, lakes, brooks, streams, water courses, reservoirs, or ponds, on or at which the said canals—

Not "canal," but "canals," for there are to be tributary canals in addition to the main canal—may start from, traverse, cross, or terminate as may be necessary for the wharves, docks, piers, buildings, or other works of the company, and may also construct such works as may be necessary to improve the navigation of said rivers and to stop the waste of waters therefrom and economize and utilize the same for the uses herein provided for.

In other words, they take so much of the public beaches or beach roads as they can under the limit described here, and you may judge of how far that power would go. Practically it would be everything that was not so patently and plainly and obviously unnecessary there for the main canal or any of the little canals or any of "the other works" that the corporation would be dictators of how much of a public beach they should take. The only restraint is that they could not sell it; they could not lease it out. There is one clause in the bill that is right generous. It is well to find something in the bill that is generous. It is section 18, as follows:

SEC. 18. That the canals and other works hereby authorized shall be lawful military and post routes, which the United States may forever use for the transmission of mails, dispatches, troops, munitions of war, supplies, and public stores, at fair and reasonable rates of compensation not exceeding that paid by private parties for the same service.

How kind not to charge the Government which freely gives them this franchise worth millions not more than is to be charged private parties for equal service!

That is the only thing I see in it of an exclusively public character. Now, as to how long it is to be in being built. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] asked me how long the Federal Government would be constructing this canal. I do not know. It depends on how crazily we are going on throwing our money away somewhere else—out oriental way—instead of devoting it to domestic developments. But how long will this corporation be at it? Here it says that they are to take fifteen years, but then there comes this significant language: "But in calculating the time aforesaid delays caused by the act of God or the act of the public enemy shall not be included." I do not know what they mean by the "delays caused by the act of God." Rains? Thunderstorms? Snows? What? I think they might commute these "acts of God," and make the whole thing twenty years or something less.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER. Eighteen minutes.

Mr. DALZELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. DAVIDSON].

Mr. DAVIDSON. Mr. Speaker, I did not expect upon the presentation of this resolution that the merits of this bill would be discussed. I am perfectly willing, however, to discuss them and go over the bill, section by section, with the Members of this House. The bill has been carefully worked over for a number of years. It has been reported to two different Congresses by the Committee on Railways and Canals. At each session we have tried to perfect the bill and to protect all public and private interests. We have given to this corporation no greater power than that possessed by any railroad corporation except in the single instance that we authorize this company to have the power to relocate or alter a railroad where it comes in contact with the canal. This is necessary, because up the Beaver River there are two or three places where the railroad as at present constructed not only crosses the river on a low bridge, but parallels it close to the bank.

The plan is to canalize the Beaver River by the construction of locks and dams which necessarily in places will raise the water, and it is apparent that in order to build the canal at all, to raise the water at all, those tracks would have to be relocated and the bridges would have to be raised. The bridges would have to have draws if not raised sufficiently high for the traffic to go under. That power is absolutely essential if the canal is to be built. We provide that all damages for changes or alterations of highways or railways, concerning which the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] has spoken, are subject to the laws of the State wherein the change is to be made. Railroads now relocate highways or private ways or relocate private works which interfere with the construction of the railroad. It obtains that under the right of eminent domain. Now, the only additional power is that this canal company shall have the power to relocate the railroad where it comes in contact with or is so close to the river as to make it necessary, but all must be done at the expense of this company, and provision is made for the fixing of that expense in damages by the State laws, if there are State laws, and if not, we make the safety provision that jurisdiction shall extend to the local Federal court of that district to protect those interests.

Now, this is a great public work, and as the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] intimates in his remarks, it will be fifty or a hundred years, possibly, before the United States Government, under its policy of improving rivers and harbors and building canals, after completing the Panama Canal and taking care of the burden of that, will be prepared to undertake a work of this kind. The fact is that, notwithstanding there are ten railroads crossing the portage between Pittsburg and Lake Erie, there is a congestion of freight that not only interferes with the business institutions of Pittsburg, but with the business institutions up the Great Lakes—in Milwaukee, Chicago, Superior, Duluth, and all of that section—through certain portions of each season.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. DAVIDSON. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Who are these incorporators?

Mr. DAVIDSON. They are among the best business men of the city of Pittsburg. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] can give a better description of each one. They have been before the committee, and they are vouched for as being men who are engaged in the great industries that center in the Pittsburg district. They propose to put in $10,000,000 cash to start the work, and then they propose to issue bonds for the balance. We have limited by very strict provisions the stock issue and the bond issue. We have safeguarded every public and private interest. The powers given are no greater than are usually given in works of this kind, and only such as are absolutely essential to the carrying out of this great enterprise.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly apparent to me from the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi that he has never studied this bill. There never was a corporation tied down by stricter terms than this proposed corporation in this bill. There is not a single power granted to it that is not absolutely necessary in the construction of a public work. Now, with respect to the method by which this resolution comes before the House, we are simply following to-day what for many, many years, until recent Congresses, has been the method in this House in fixing time for consideration of a bill. Instead of having a special rule brought in by the Committee on Rules, as is now customary, five or six Congresses ago the custom was, on suspension day, to pass a resolution, under suspension of the rules, fixing a day for the consideration of bills, so that the gentleman is mistaken with respect to my position so far as that is concerned.

Now, what is this proposition, Mr. Speaker? Between the Great Lakes and the Ohio River intervenes a space of about 100 miles. If that 100 miles was covered by a canal there would be a continuous waterway from the Atlantic Ocean to the Gulf of Mexico, from the port of New York to the port of New Orleans, by way of the Erie Canal, the Great Lakes, this proposed canal, and the Ohio and Mississippi rivers—a great national highway, carrying the commerce of twenty-one States of this Union. Now, what is the proposition? The proposition is that private citizens, without waiting for an appropriation from the Federal Treasury, not expecting ever to get an appropriation from the Federal Treasury, shall put up their own means to construct this great national highway, upon which, according to the testimony offered before the Committee on Railways and Canals, there would be a saving on every ton of freight carried from Lake Erie to the Ohio River of 50 cents; in other words, nearly $20,000,000 a year in the aggregate of freight between those two points.

A great national highway proposed to be constructed by private enterprise, and do you mean to tell me that this House will not permit them to enter upon such a work?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. DALZELL. I have not the time to spare.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I just wanted to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. DALZELL. Well, ask the question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does the gentleman intend the House to understand these people are not going to make a profit out of this venture?

Mr. DALZELL. I mean to have the House understand that these people expect to make nothing more than a reasonable return upon their money. Why, so far as that is concerned the bill expressly provides that tolls and freight charges within the States of Ohio and Pennsylvania shall be subject to the State legislatures. So far as tolls upon the highway as an interstate-commerce highway are concerned they are subject to the Interstate Commerce Commission. So far as the gentlemen are concerned, about whom the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] asked, I would say that they are among the best and most enterprising and highly respected citizens of the city of Pittsburg. I know of no one opposed to this great measure outside of the Members on the other side of the House, but the railroads whose traffic is expected to be interferred with. I am here solely in the interest, as I say of a great national, not sectional, not local, but a great national work, and all we are asking is the poor boon of being allowed to build it.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Is it not true this is to be made a part of a railroad system?

Mr. DALZELL. On the contrary, it is intended to be a great regulator of freights between the Lakes and the Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Is not this intended to be a complement to the great system of the 9-foot stage of the Ohio River between Pittsburg and Cairo?

Mr. DALZELL. I was just coming to that. The United States has spent millions of money on the Ohio. The harbor of Pittsburg has been extended to the mouth of the Beaver, and we now have the prospect of a 9-foot channel from Pittsburg to Cairo, and when that is completed then with this canal you would have a continuous waterway, as I have said, from the port of New York to the port of New Orleans, and eventually through the Panama Canal to the Pacific Ocean.

That is the enterprise for which I am asking from the House to-day the poor boon of a right to consider it, a right to have it debated. Are you afraid, gentlemen, to have it debated, or will you give me an opportunity to be heard upon the merits of the question? Why, I venture to say that if the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] had not taken the floor a few moments ago there would not have been ten votes on that side of the House against this proposition. I speak with knowledge. I have discussed this measure with many men on that side of the House who have given it their heartiest approval, and who would vote to-day for this resolution if it were not—not as the gentleman from Mississippi says, not truly not a partisan measure, but the contrary—if it were not made by his selection as spokesman a party measure. Now, Mr. Speaker, let us have a vote. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER. The question is on suspending the rules and agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL].

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seem to have it.

Mr. BURNETT. Division, Mr. Speaker.

Thereupon the House divided; and the Chair announced that there were—ayes 153, nays 86.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 120, nays 72, answered "present" 11, not voting 181, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not voted.

Mr. FINLEY. Then I wish to withdraw my vote and answer "present."

The name of Mr. FINLEY was called and he voted "present."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

AMERICAN VESSELS IN THE COASTWISE TRADE.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I make the report on the bill (H. R. 5281) to remove discriminations against American sailing vessels in the coastwise trade, and asks unanimous consent for the filing of the views of the minority to-day. Then I ask unanimous consent for the publication of the report and the views of the minority in one document with 2,000 extra copies.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Reserving the right to object, I will ask the gentleman what the bill is?

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. It is a bill to remove discriminations against American sailing vessels in the coastwise trade. This is all understood. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SPIGHT] has agreed to it.

The SPEAKER. Is the minority ready to report?

Mr. SPIGHT. The minority is ready to report.

The SPEAKER. It does not require unanimous consent.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is no objection to the request of the gentleman. I did not see my colleague present.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. I ask unanimous consent that the report of the committee and views of the minority be printed in one document and that there be 2,000 extra copies printed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. LITTLEFIELD. The print of the bill has been exhausted, and I would like to ask for a reprint of the bill H. R. 5281.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Maine? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

H. R. 7302. An act granting an increase of pension to James G. Head; and
H. R. 11324. An act granting an increase of pension to Sarah E. MacGowan.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:
H. R. 7085. An act authorizing the Pea River Power Company to erect a dam in Coffee County, Ala.;
H. R. 8773. An act granting an increase of pension to William H. Joslin;
H. R. 13567. An act to authorize the Campbell Lumber Company to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River in Clay County, Ark., at or near the point where the section line between sections 21 and 28, township 19 north, range 9 east, touches said river;
H. R. 13568. An act to authorize the Campbell Lumber Company to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River, in Clay County, Ark., at or near the point where the section line between sections 23 and 26, in township 20 north, range 9 east, touches said river;
H. R. 11045. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize Washington and Westmoreland counties, in the State of Pennsylvania, to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River, in the State of Pennsylvania," approved February 21, 1903; and
H. R. 11263. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the navigable waters of St. Andrews Bay.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bills of the following titles:

S. 1007. An act to repeal section 4136 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the admission of registry of repaired foreign wrecks; and

S. 2106. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at or near Van Buren, Ark.

ISTHMIAN CANAL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I submit herewith the letter of the Secretary of War, transmitting the report of the Board of Consulting Engineers on the Panama Canal and the report of the Isthmian Canal Commission thereon, together with a letter written to the chairman of the Isthmian Canal Commission by Chief Engineer Stevens. Both the Board of Consulting Engineers and the Canal Commission divide in their report. The majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers—eight in number, including the five foreign engineers—favor a sea-level canal, and one member of the Canal Commission, Admiral Endicott, takes the same view. Five of the eight American members of the Board of Consulting Engineers and five members of the Isthmian Canal Commission favor the lock canal, and so does Chief Engineer Stevens. The Secretary of War recommends a lock canal pursuant to the recommendation of the minority of the Board of Consulting Engineers and of the majority of the Canal Commission. After careful study of the papers submitted and full and exhaustive consideration of the whole subject I concur in this recommendation.

It will be noticed that the American engineers on the consulting board and on the Commission by a more than two to one majority favor the lock canal, whereas the foreign engineers are a unit against it. I think this is partly to be explained by the fact that the great traffic canal of the Old World is the Suez Canal, a sea-level canal, whereas the great traffic canal of the New World is the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, a lock canal. Although the latter, the "Soo," is closed to navigation during the winter months, it carries annually three times the traffic of the Suez Canal. In my judgment the very able argument of the majority of the Board of Consulting Engineers is vitiated by their failure to pay proper heed to the lessons taught by the construction and operation of the Soo Canal. It must be borne in mind, as the Commission points out, that there is no question of building what has been picturesquely termed "the Straits of Panama"—that is, a waterway through which the largest vessels could go with safety at uninterrupted high speed. Both the sea-level canal and the proposed lock canal would be too narrow and shallow to be called with any truthfulness a strait or to have any of the properties of a wide, deep water strip. Both of them would be canals, pure and simple. Each type has certain disadvantages and certain advantages. But in my judgment the disadvantages are fewer and the advantages very much greater in the case of a lock canal substantially as proposed in the papers forwarded herewith, and I call especial attention to the fact that the chief engineer, who will be mainly responsible for the success of this mighty engineering feat, and who has, therefore, a peculiar personal interest in judging aright, is emphatically and earnestly in favor of the lock-canal project and against the sea-level project.

A careful study of the reports seem to establish a strong probability that the following are the facts: The sea-level canal would be slightly less exposed to damage in the event of war; the running expenses, apart from the heavy cost of interest on the amount employed to build it, would be less; and for small ships the time of transit would probably be less. On the other hand, the lock canal at a level of 80 feet or thereabouts would not cost much more than half as much to build, and could be built in about half the time, while there would be very much less risk connected with building it, and for large ships the transit would be quicker; while, taking into account the interest on the amount saved in building, the actual cost of maintenance would be less. After being built it would be easier to enlarge the lock canal than the sea-level canal. Moreover, what has been actually demonstrated in making and operating the great lock canal, the Soo, a more important artery of traffic than the great sea-level canal, the Suez, goes to support the opinion of the minority of the Consulting Board of Engineers and of the majority of the Isthmian Canal Commission as to the superior safety, feasibility, and desirability of building a lock canal at Panama.

The law now on our statute books seems to contemplate a lock canal. In my judgment a lock canal, as herein recommended, is advisable. If the Congress directs that a sea-level canal be constructed its direction will of course be carried out. Otherwise the canal will be built on substantially the plan for a lock canal outlined in the accompanying papers, such changes being made, of course, as may be found actually necessary, including possibly the change recommended by the Secretary of War as to the site of the dam on the Pacific side.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 19, 1906.

NOTE.—Papers accompanied similar message to the Senate.

The message, with the accompanying documents, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. MARSHALL, for two days, on account of important business.

JOHN H. LAMSON.

By unanimous consent, at the request of Mr. MCCALL, leave was granted to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of John H. Lamson, Fifty-eighth Congress, no adverse report having been made thereon.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination, with plan and estimate of cost, of construction of a bridge across the waterway between Chincoteaque Bay, Virginia, and Delaware Bay—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed, with accompanying illustrations.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Attorney-General submitting a modification of estimate of appropriation for clerks in the office of Solicitor of the Treasury—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an estimate of appropriation for care and custody of the insane of the District of Alaska—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, transmitting, with a favorable recommendation, a draft of a bill relating to the anchorage and movements of vessels in Hampton Roads and the harbors of Norfolk and Newport News, Virginia—to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Attorney-General submitting a modification of estimate of appropriation for clerks in the office of Solicitor of the Treasury—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of Cheboygan Harbor, Michigan, with plan of improvement—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, submitting a statement as to the destruction of useless papers in the War Department and making a recommendation of legislation as to the change of the method of disposal of such papers—to the Joint Select Committee on Disposition of Useless Papers in the Departments, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor submitting an estimate of appropriation for construction of a light-house tender for the sixth light-house district—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of War submitting an estimate of appropriation for a military hospital in the Moro Military Reservation, San Juan, P. R.—to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a response to the inquiry of the House relating to the sale of the custom-house property in New York City—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 20, 1906.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on request of Mr. GALLINGER, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Journal stands approved.

PORTO RICO PROVISIONAL REGIMENT OF INFANTRY.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, for inclusion in the Army appropriation bill, the draft of a proviso to extend the terms of enlistment for enlisted men in the Porto Rico Provisional Regiment of Infantry; which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed an act (S. 3318) to allow the entry and clearance of vessels at San Luis Obispo, Port Harford, and Monterey, Cal., with an amendment in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 10853. An act to prohibit gambling in the Territories;

H. R. 11501. An act to amend an act to provide for circuit and district courts of the United States at Albany, Ga.;

H. R. 12064. An act to amend section 7 of an act entitled "An act to provide for a permanent Census Office," approved March 6, 1902; and

H. R. 12864. An act to provide for the purchase of certain coal claims in the island of Batan, in the Philippine Islands.

The message further announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution requesting the President to return to the House the bill (H. R. 1059) granting an increase of pension to Elijah Spangler; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

S. 1007. An act to repeal section 4136 of the Revised Statutes, relating to the admission to registry of repaired foreign wrecks;

S. 2106. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Arkansas River at or near Van Buren, Ark.;

H. R. 7085. An act authorizing the Pea River Power Company to erect a dam in Coffee County, Ala.;

H. R. 8773. An act granting an increase of pension to William H. Joslin;

H. R. 11045. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize Washington and Westmoreland counties, in the State of Pennsylvania, to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River, in the State of Pennsylvania," approved February 21, 1903;

H. R. 11263. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the navigable waters of St. Andrews Bay;

H. R. 13567. An act to authorize the Campbell Lumber Company to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River in Clay County, Ark., at or near the point where the section line between sections 21 and 28, township 19 north, range 9 east, touches said river; and

H. R. 13568. An act to authorize the Campbell Lumber Company to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River, in Clay County, Ark., at or near the point where the section line between sections 23 and 26, township 20 north, range 9 east, touches said river.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I have been asked to present four petitions praying for prohibition in the proposed new State of Oklahoma. One of the petitions is 264 feet long and contains the signatures of 8,164 voters in the Territory of Oklahoma. Another is a petition containing the names of 6,613 women, and another from young people in the Territory, containing 6,867 names. The fourth petition is signed exclusively by Indians in that Territory.

As the bill has been reported, I move that the petitions lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I present a petition signed by quite a number of leading citizens and officials of the State of New Hampshire, including the secretary of state, the State treasurer, one ex-governor, the attorney-general of the State, the commissioner of labor, and others, asking that the first census of the United States, that of 1790, may be reprinted. These good people say:

> The information embraced in this census, particularly in the report from the New England States, is of very great value to the descendants of these families. Such descendants are scattered all over the United States, and we have reason to know that the printed record if made accessible to citizens of the United States all over the country will be regarded by them as of a value that can hardly be exaggerated. We know of no work of the kind that will so well reward the labor and expense of publication. If the Government sees fit to make it exclusively a publication to be bought and paid for at the cost of printing we think the Government can easily get back every cent thus expended.

I move that the petition be referred to the Committee on the Census, and under the proper call I shall introduce a joint resolution relating to the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER presented a petition of the Grays Harbor Trades and Labor Council, of Aberdeen, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation relating to the complement of crews of vessels; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the petition of L. Schlater, of Philadelphia, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation granting separate statehood to the Indian Territory; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of Local Branch No. 2, Audubon Society, of Campbellsville, Ky., praying for the enactment of legislation to prohibit the killing of wild birds and animals in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of the Unitarian Club of Washington, D. C., praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the employment of child labor in the District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of sundry property owners and residents of Douglas street, Washington, D. C., praying for the enactment of legislation to change the name of that street to Clifton street; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (for Mr. PROCTOR) presented petitions of Local Division No. 163, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Newport; of St. Albans Division, No. 24, Order of Railway Conductors, of St. Albans; of Local Division No. 269, Order of Railway Conductors, of Rutland, and of Local Division No. 347, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Rutland, all in the State of Vermont, praying for the passage of the so-called "employers' liability bill" and also the "anti-injunction bill;" which were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. PERKINS presented a petition of the Associated Veterans of the Mexican War, of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to increase the pensions of all survivors of the Mexican war; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of the board of directors of the Citrus Fruit Association of Ontario, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation making immediately effective all decisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Alexander Hamilton Council, No. 35, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of San Francisco, Cal., and a petition of the Japanese and Korean Exclusion League of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict immigration; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of San Francisco Lodge, No. 68, Independent Association of Machinists, of San Francisco, Cal., praying for the enactment of legislation to increase the wages of workmen employed in the gun factory at the navy-yard, Washington, D. C.; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SCOTT presented petitions of J. K. Staggers, of Wise; of Ridgedale Council, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Ridgedale, and of Columbian Council, No. 101, Junior Order United American Mechanics, of Hacker Valley, all in the State of West Virginia, praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict immigration and also for the revision of the laws governing naturalization; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. BEVERIDGE presented a petition of Local Branch No. 212, United Commercial Travelers, of Fort Wayne, Ind., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the present national bankruptcy law to include traveling salesmen as preferred creditors; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of the Farmers' Institute of Wayne County, of the Commercial Club of Fort Wayne, and of sundry physicians of Lafayette, all in the State of Indiana, praying for the passage of the so-called "pure-food bill;" which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of the Murphy Kuntz Lumber Company, of Middletown, Ind., praying for the enactment of legislation to enlarge the powers of the Interstate Commerce Commission; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. PILES presented a petition of the Grays Harbor Trades and Labor Council, of Aberdeen, Wash., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the bill relating to the complement of crews of vessels; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of Mount Pleasant Grange, No. 197, Patrons of Husbandry, of Washougal, Wash., praying for the enactment of legislation to remove the duty on denaturized alcohol; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions of Local Divisions Nos. 1, 2, and 4, Ancient Order of Hibernians, of King County, Wash., praying that an appropriation of $50,000 be made for the erection of a monument to the memory of the late Commodore John Barry; which were referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented a petition of Puget Sound Lodge, No. 407, Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen, of Seattle, Wash., praying for the passage of the so-called "employers' liability bill;" which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. HANSBROUGH presented a petition of sundry citizens of North Dakota, praying for an investigation of the charges made and filed against the Hon. REED SMOOT, a Senator from the State of Utah; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. OVERMAN presented a petition of sundry citizens of Mount Airy, N. C., praying for an investigation of the existing conditions in the Kongo Free State; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. McCUMBER presented the memorial of H. A. Bruenn and sundry other citizens of Ashley, N. Dak., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation changing the classification of third and fourth class postal matter; which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. DRYDEN presented petitions of the Camden Commercial College, of Camden; of the Eagan School of Business, of Hoboken, and of the Rider Moore and Stewart Schools of Business, of Trenton, all in the State of New Jersey, praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the publications of all educational institutions; which were referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

He also presented the petition of Henry W. Ribbert, of Phoenix, Ariz., remonstrating against the admission into the Union of the Territories of Arizona and New Mexico as one State; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented sundry petitions of citizens of New York City, N. Y., praying for the enactment of legislation to prevent the impending destruction of Niagara Falls on the American side by the diversion of the waters for manufacturing purposes; which were referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

He also presented a memorial of the congregation of the De Groot Methodist Episcopal Church, of Newark, N. J., remonstrating against the repeal of the present anticanteen law; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented a petition of Local Division No. 18, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, of Rochester, N. Y., praying for the passage of the so-called "employers' liability bill" and also the "anti-injunction bill;" which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented petitions of the R. T. French Company, of Rochester; of the Croton Chemical Company, of New York City, and of the Homeopathic Medical Society of New York City, all in the State of New York, praying for the passage of the so-called "pure-food bill;" which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. CARTER presented sundry papers to accompany the bill (S. 4421) for the relief of S. W. Langhorne and H. S. Howell; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

THE FRIGATE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. LODGE. I present a memorial in regard to the frigate Constitution, from the Massachusetts Historical Society, signed only by the officers of the society. It is a brief but very interesting memorial, and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD, together with the signatures, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the memorial presented by him be printed in the RECORD, together with the signatures.

Mr. LODGE. There are only a half dozen.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the memorial will be printed in the RECORD, together with the signatures, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The memorial is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The undersigned, the council of the Massachusetts Historical Society, acting under its instructions, again memorializes your honorable bodies in regard to the U. S. frigate Constitution, and the disposition to be made of that historic vessel.

A copy of a previous memorial on the same subject, heretofore submitted by us under similar conditions, is hereto appended, and to it we respectfully call your attention.

In the annual report of the Secretary of the Navy recently submitted it is, however, stated that the vessel now lying at Charlestown is, because of repeated renewals, not the historic Constitution, or "the vessel with which Hull captured the Guerrière," and that to hold her forth as such is a case of "false pretenses;" that if repaired and put in commission "she would be absolutely useless," and, finally, that thus to restore her would be "a perfectly unjustifiable waste of public money." She should, therefore, be broken up, or, as an alternative, knocked to pieces and sunk as something of no further practical use—what is designated as "a maritime end" being thus "for purely sentimental reasons" conceded her.

Your memorialists do not propose to argue these several points; we confine ourselves to protesting earnestly against them, and one and all denying them. If the vessel now moored at the Charlestown dock is not the historic frigate Constitution, then the society for which we speak is not the Massachusetts Historical Society, for it was organized six years before the Constitution was launched, and the last survivor of our original members died sixty-five years ago; five times has the society changed its habitation; it has hardly a thing in possession which belonged to it in 1792, or in 1812; its very name has undergone legal alteration. Yet we hold it needless to argue that, through constant renewal and by unbroken succession, this society is the Massachusetts Historical Society of 1791, and it is assuredly so regarded. We would look upon a denial of our identity as at least ill considered. It is in no respect otherwise in the case of the Constitution.

The assertion officially made that the present ship if rebuilt on her old lines would, when completed, "be absolutely useless" is scarcely less matter of surprise. Her sister frigate of exactly coeval build, the Constellation, has recently been repaired, and is now used as a training ship attached to the Naval War College at Newport, while another similar ship, now called the Severn, but until recently bearing the ill-omened name of Chesapeake, is in commission and connected with the Naval Academy at Annapolis. Formerly the Constitution was so attached to the academy, and a distinguished admiral, still on the active list, has recently testified to the "intense interest" she excited in him when as a boy he for months lived aboard her. Why, then, it is pertinent to ask, should not the single symbolic "fighting frigate" of our earlier Navy, around which associations cluster, be restored, put in commission and used to replace the Constellation or the Severn, formerly the Chesapeake, to which vessels comparatively little historic interest, and, in the case of the last, less than no patriotic sentiments attach? Why should they be repaired and maintained and the Constitution utilized as a "target?"

If to repair and maintain the Constitution would be an "unjustifiable waste" of the public money of the United States, what can be said on behalf of the Victory and the outlay she entails on the British exchequer? That Nelson's flagship, which so proudly broke the opposing line at Trafalgar seven years before the Constitution called down the flag of the Guerrière, should now be towed to sea and practiced at as a target by modern ironclads would as a suggestion from the admiralty board not only shock the public opinion of Great Britain, but be resented as an outrage, or at best an unseemly levity. Are Americans less susceptible to sentiment, patriotism, and gratitude than their cousins across the sea? To-day, a century after Nelson died in her cockpit, the Victory, cherished by Great Britain as one of the most precious relics of her sea glories, is annually visited by scores of thousands of all nations. So, as the long record of those who flock to see her bears witness, the Constitution is in no less degree an inspiration to Americans. They feel toward her as toward a sentient being, for in one short half hour, in a time of deepest gloom, her broadsides elevated the United States from being an unconsidered people beyond the sea into respect as a confessed world power. She then did for us more than the Victory ever did for England.

Therefore, in the name and on behalf of the society we represent, we renew the prayer embodied in the accompanying memorial of 1903. We ask that immediate action be taken to the end that the course pursued by the British Admiralty as respects the line-of-battle ship Victory be pursued by the United States Navy Department in the case of the frigate Constitution. Accordingly, we pray your honorable bodies that the necessary steps forthwith be taken for preserving the "fighting frigate" of 1812; that she be repaired and renewed, and once more put in commission to be used as a training ship in connection with our naval academies; and that, navigated as such by the students of the academies, she be made in future to visit at suitable seasons points along our coast where she may be easily accessible to that large and ever-increasing number of American citizens who, retaining a sense of affection, as well as of deep gratitude to her, feel also a patriotic and an abiding interest in the associations she will never cease to recall.

And your memorialists will ever pray, etc.

BOSTON, January 11, 1906.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

Your memorialists, the council of the Massachusetts Historical Society, acting under its instructions, would respectfully call the attention of your honorable bodies to certain facts connected with the U. S. frigate Constitution:

That vessel is now lying at Charlestown, Mass., in a dock also used by the steamships of the so-called "White Star Line;" she is dismantled, out of repair, and liable at any time to injury from carelessness or accident, if not to destruction. Your memorialists further represent that in the American mind an historical interest attaches to the Constitution such as attaches to no other ship in maritime annals, except possibly the Santa Maria, the flagship of Columbus, and the Mayflower, both of which disappeared centuries ago. The Constitution still remains; and it was the Constitution which, in the gloomiest hour of the war of 1812–1814 appeared "like a bright gleam in the darkness." On the 16th of August of that year, Detroit, with all it garrisons, munitions, and defenses, was surrendered to the British forces; on the same day Fort Dearborn, at what is now Chicago, was in flames, and with it "the last vestige of American authority on the Western Lakes disappeared." The discouragement was universal and the sense of national humiliation extreme, for it seemed doubtful if even the interior line of the Wabash could be successfully held against an enemy flushed with success. The prophet of yet other disasters immediately impending was abroad, and, according to his wont, further depressed the already disheartened land. It was in this hour of deepest gloom that, on the morning of Sunday, August 30, the Sabbath silence of Boston was broken and the town stirred to unwonted excitement "as the news passed through the quiet streets that the Constitution was below, in the outer harbor, with Dacres," of the Guerrière, "and his crew prisoners on board." Thus it so chanced that the journal which the next morning informed Bostonians of the Detroit humiliation, in another column of the same issue announced that naval action which "however small the affair might appear on the general scale of the world's battles, raised the United States in one-half hour to the rank of a first-class power in the world." The jealousy of the Navy, which had until then characterized the more recent national policy, vanished forever "in the flash of Hull's first broadside."

The victory, moreover, was most dramatic—a naval duel. The adversaries—not only commanders but ship's companies to a man—had sought each other out for a test of seamanship, discipline, and gunnery—arrogance and the confidence of prestige on the one side, a passionate sense of wrong on the other. They met in mid-Atlantic—frigate to frigate. It was on the afternoon of August 19, the wind blowing fresh, the sea running high. For about an hour the two ships maneuvered for position, but at last, a few minutes before 6 o'clock, "they came together side by side, within pistol shot, the wind almost astern, and running before it they pounded each other with all their strength. As rapidly as the guns could be worked the Constitution poured in broadside after broadside, double shotted with round and grape, and, without exaggeration, the echo of those guns startled the world." Of her first broadside in that action the master of an American brig, then a captive on board the British ship, afterwards wrote: "About 6 o'clock I heard a tremendous explosion from the opposing frigate. The effect of her shot seemed to make the Guerrière reel and tremble as though she had received the shock of an earthquake." "In less than thirty minutes from the time we got alongside of the enemy," reported Captain Hull to the Secretary of the Navy, "she was left without a spar standing, and the hull cut to pieces in such a manner as to make it difficult to keep her above water."

The historian has truly said of that conflict: "Isaac Hull was nephew to the unhappy general (who, three days before the Constitution overcame the Guerrière, had capitulated at Detroit), and perhaps the shattered hulk of the Guerrière, which the nephew left at the bottom of the Atlantic Ocean, 800 miles east of Boston, was worth for the moment the whole province which the uncle had lost 800 miles to the westward. * * * No experience of history ever went to the heart of New England more directly than this victory, so peculiarly its own; but the delight was not confined to New England, and extreme though it seemed it was still not extravagant."

Therefore it is that the Massachusetts Historical Society, already, in 1812, an organization more than twenty years in existence, now directs this memorial to be submitted—she, the oldest among them, speaking through her council for all other similar societies throughout New England. In so doing it is needless to enter into the earlier and later history of what was essentially the "Fighting Frigate" of the first American Navy; for, in the memory of the people of the United States, the Constitution is, throughout her long record, inseparably associated with feats of daring and seamanship—devotion and dashing—than which none in all naval history are more skillful, more stirring, or more deserving of commemoration. How can they be so effectively commemorated as by the pious and lasting preservation of the ancient ship, now slowly rotting at the wharf opposite to which she was launched six years more than a century ago?

And while the name of the Constitution is thus not only synonymous with courage, seamanship, patriotism, and unbroken triumph, the ship herself is typical of a maritime architecture as extinct as the galley or the trireme. She slid from the ways at what is still known in her honor as "Constitution Wharf" in Boston Harbor ten months before Nelson won the battle of the Nile, and eight years to a day before his famous flagship, the Victory, bore his broad pennant in triumph through the Franco-Spanish line at Trafalgar; and your memorialists hold that, in the eyes and minds of the people of the United States, no less an interest and sentiment attach to the Constitution than in Great Britain attach to the Victory. The Constitution in the days of our deep tribulation did more for us than ever even the flagship of Nelson did for England; and, thenceforth, she has been to Americans as a sentient being, to whom gratitude is due.

Yet by Great Britain the Victory ever has been and now is tenderly cared for, and jealously preserved among the most precious of national memorials. As such, it is yearly visited by thousands,* among whom Americans are not least in number. The same care has not been extended over the Constitution; and yet your memorialists would not for a moment suggest, nor do they believe, that the people, the Parliament, or the Government of Great Britain are more grateful, more patriotic, or endowed with a keener sense of pride than the people, the Congress, or the Administration of the United States. As for the people, the contrary is, in the case of the Constitution, incontrovertibly proven by the names of the thousands of pilgrims from all sections of the country annually inscribed on her register.† So far as the Government is concerned, its failure to take measures for the lasting preservation of the old ship has been due, in the opinion of your memorialists, neither to indifference nor to an unworthy spirit of thrift, but to the fact that, amid the multifarious matters calling for immediate action, the preserving of an old-time frigate, even though freighted with glorious memories, has been somewhat unduly, though not perhaps unnaturally, deferred to a more opportune occasion.

None the less, the Constitution "is the yet living monument, not alone of her own victories, but of the men behind the guns who won them. She speaks to us of patriotism and courage, of the devotion to an idea, and to a sentiment for which men laid down their lives." Therefore your memorialists would respectfully ask that immediate provision be made to the end that the course pursued by the British Admiralty in the case of the Victory may be pursued by our Navy Department in the case of the Constitution. We accordingly pray your honorable bodies that the necessary steps forthwith be taken for preserving the "Fighting Frigate" of 1812; that she be renewed, put in commission as a training ship, and at suitable seasons be in future stationed at points along our coasts, where she may be easily accessible to that large and ever-increasing number of American citizens who, retaining a sense of affection, as well as deep gratitude, to her, feel also a patriotic and an abiding interest in the associations which the frigate Constitution will never cease to recall.

And your memorialists will ever pray, etc.

BOSTON, December 31, 1903.

The engagement between the Constitution and the Guerrière took place on the afternoon of August 19, 1812. The ship made Boston Harbor during the night of Saturday, August 29. The next day news of the combat circulated in Boston. The subjoined article, prepared at its suggestion by a member of the Massachusetts Historical Society in furtherance of the foregoing memorial, appeared in the editorial columns of the Boston Herald in its issue of Tuesday, August 30, 1904:

"SUNDAY, AUGUST 30, 1812.

"In 1812—ninety-two years ago—the 30th of August fell on a Sunday; a Sunday of great though suppressed excitement in what was still the town of Boston. For during the early hours of that Sabbath morning a rumor suddenly ran through Boston streets, and pervaded its homes, that the frigate Constitution was lying below, in the outer harbor—that in ship-to-ship fight she had sunk the Guerrière, and that she had on board the English captain and his crew, prisoners of war. The Puritan traditions as respects Sunday observances still held sway; but on that particular Sabbath the meeting-house porches were alive with whispered excitement, and all day long silent, well-dressed groups lined the southern wharves, or from the summit of house or hill peered seaward, straining their eyes for a glimpse of the hull and spars of the now famous ship of war. All day she lay quietly at her anchorage in the roads.

"Monday morning she was still there; but early that day the frigate had occasion, in the famous figure of speech of George Canning, to 'assume the likeness of an animated thing, instinct with life and motion;' to ruffle its swelling plumage; to put forth its beauty and its bravery, and, collecting its scattered elements of strength, to prepare again to 'awaken its dormant thunder.' Fatigued beyond endurance by the strain and anxiety of the last fourteen days, believing himself and his ship at last in safety, Capt. Isaac Hull had been suddenly roused from a deep sleep by the startling report that an armed squadron was at the harbor's mouth and bearing in upon him. Simultaneously weighing anchor and clearing decks for action, he boldly moved out to meet the danger; but, as the Constitution approached the leader of the advancing squadron, signals instead of shots were exchanged, and to Hull's great relief he saluted the broad pennon of Commodore Rodgers, unexpectedly making port from a fruitless cruise.

"Not until Tuesday, the 1st of September, did the Constitution find her way up above the Castle to an anchorage in the inner harbor. Hull then landed, and as he made a progress up State street to the Exchange Coffee House, then Boston's chief hostelry, the town went wild. Innumerable flags waved, a procession was formed, salutes were exchanged between the shore and the ships of war, and the intense feeling found utterance in every form of sound and motion. There was, too, sufficing occasion for it all. Its sense of self-respect had suddenly been restored to a people.

"Almost the last of three generations have since passed away, and with them the memory of the conditions at that time prevailing. The event celebrated was but a fight between two frigates, and the victor greatly predominated in every element of strength; but a spell was broken, an insult had been avenged. Boston probably had never given way to such an outburst before; it has certainly given way to none such since. To understand its significance and realize its justification it is now necessary to recall a forgotten past.

"In 1812 the United States, deemed a third-class power in the world—less than Portugal, hardly more than Algiers—had for a score of years been the unresenting football of antagonists as overbearing as they were powerful. Hamlet long before had said:

'"Tis dangerous when the baser nature comes
Between the past and fell-incensed points
Of mighty opposites.'

"And of this the United States had long afforded proof. With Napoleon and the country of Nelson and Wellington locked in a long

* During the summer as many as 5,000 persons have visited the ship in one day. (Report of Capt. C. H. Stockton to the Chief of Bureau of Navigation, January 27, 1904.)

† It is stated that nearly 100,000 persons have visited the Constitution during the last three years.

death grapple, the young American nation had thought to traffic on their fields of battle. It had done so systematically and as matter of policy, regardless of insults and buffets. A people can not pursue this course in a pure spirit of gain, preserving its manhood; and it must be admitted as historical truth that between 1807 and 1812 the people of the United States in general, and those of New England more especially, had lost all sense of pride. Not without a consciousness that it was true, they read of themselves in the columns of the English press as 'spanielllike in character,' a people who 'the more they were chastised the more obsequious they became;' and one, moreover, which 'could not be kicked into a war.' The very frigate they had built and launched and manned, now lying at their harbor's mouth, had been contemptuously referred to as 'a bundle of pine boards sailing under a bit of striped bunting.' Submitting to it all, their confidence in themselves was wholly gone. Suddenly it had been restored; once more they held up their heads, victors over their bully in a square yardarm fight—small wonder that they went wild! Had they failed to do so they would have been more or less than men.

"Recalled through the vista of years, the situation was, withal, in every respect dramatic. England, in the years which followed Trafalgar, was fairly drunk with a consciousness of sea power. She ruled the wave. None questioned her absolute supremacy. Hers, almost immemorially, had been a record of unbroken victory—victory on a scale both large and small. During twenty years of incessant conflict, numbering in them more than 200 ship-to-ship encounters of approximately equal force, the cross of St. George had averaged but one defeat in every forty fights. Contemptuously ignoring all international rules of courtesy or conduct, she had made the United States gulp down the very dregs in the cup of humiliation; for, on the 22d of June, 1807, in sight of the American coast, the unlucky frigate Chesapeake had been compelled to drag her way, a battered, helpless hulk, back to the port from which she had the day before sailed, disgraced and degraded, with officers and crew smarting under a humiliation never either forgotten or forgiven. Unresistingly pounded into abject submission, her company had been mustered on her own deck by a British subaltern, and those whom he saw fit to designate had been taken forcibly from her. Five years later had occurred the affair of the President and the Little Belt. Numerically the armed ships of the United States were to those of Great Britain as one to a hundred; morally they were as nothing. As was said at the time: 'No one act of the little navy had been at all calculated to gain the respect of the British. First was seen the Chesapeake allowing herself to be beaten with impunity by a British ship only nominally superior to her. Then the huge frigate President attacks and fights for nearly three-quarters of an hour the British sloop Little Belt, of only eighteen guns, and it was claimed, had been beaten off by her.' It was asserted also that those in command of the President had mistaken the sloop Little Belt for the frigate Guerrière; and because of that, Captain Dacres of the Guerrière and his crew felt the full passion and duty of revenge. In future there was to be no possibility of mistake, and so the Guerrière wore her name writ large on her mainsail. She hungered for a meeting with the President.

"And the day came when the Constitution took upon herself the quarrel of her sister ship, and in her turn hungered for a meeting with the Guerrière. On the 19th of August, 1812—fifteen months after the affair of the Little Belt—that hunger was appeased. The story of what then occurred, and where it occurred, is familiar. It will not bear repetition. Suffice it to say that war had at last been declared with Great Britain on the 18th of June, 1812. Then followed an unbroken series of military disasters, culminating in August with the disgraceful surrender of Detroit and the destruction of Fort Dearborn, where Chicago now stands. The entire Northwest was either in possession of the enemy or at his mercy. The cup of humiliation was full; it apparently only remained to drain it. The collapse was complete; and, where open panic did not rule, utter discouragement prevailed. In the midst of it all the Constitution sailed on the 5th of July out of the Chesapeake, and into the midst of the British squadron. She eluded and outfooted them, her escape a marvel of skill and endurance. During a part of that three-day ordeal the Guerrière was at the front and pitted against her. On the 26th of July Hull reached Boston. He then had reason to believe he was about to be called upon to turn his command over to another, but first he was in search of a fight. He knew his ship; he had tested his crew; he craved the square issue of battle. So, reporting his arrival, he did not wait for orders, but on the 2d of August turned the Constitution's prow seaward. The very next day the anticipated order came. He was relieved of his command; but, with that command, he was out of the way, headed for mid-Atlantic, hunting for an opponent. His ship's company shared his eagerness; from the youngest powder monkey to the executive officer they were in the hunt, and when at last on the afternoon of Wednesday, August 19, the grim order to clear away for action came, it was met with a joyous cheer. This was at 4 p. m. Two hours and a half later the Guerrière was rolling in the trough of the sea, a battered, spariess, foundering hulk. The next day she sank. She is there in mid-ocean now.

"The details of that memorable conflict are in every American history, and there is neither reason nor space here to recount them. One incident is, however, less well known, and, in these days of race feeling and burnings at the stake, may well be recalled. The African race is, fortunately, not as a rule resentful, but it so chanced that of the four men forcibly taken by the Leopard from the Chesapeake in June, 1807, two were negroes. Shipped at Annapolis the Constitution numbered in its crew others of the same blood—black men, with woolly hair. Referring afterwards to this fact and the conduct of those men, Hull, a rough seafaring sailor of the period, remarked: 'I never had any better fighters than those niggers. They stripped to the waist and fought like devils, sir, seeming to be utterly insensible to danger and to be possessed with a determination to outfight the white sailors.' The cry was not then, 'Remember the Maine!' but 'Remember the Chesapeake!' and perhaps the negroes had it on their lips as well as in their hearts.

"This was on the 19th of August, 800 miles east of Boston, about south of Cape Race, on the present route to Southampton. Ten days later the anchor of the Constitution again gripped bottom off Rainsford's, in Boston Harbor. It was a case of David returning from his combat with Goliath. Probably in their day David's astonished compatriots cheered to the echo their champion. The Bostonians certainly did so now, for, yesterday cowering, to-day they stood erect. A deathly spell was dispelled. They, too, could fight. The 30th of August was the awakening day.

"Yet, strangely enough, by some unaccountable chain of circumstance, that frigate, which then restored to the nation its sense of self-respect, is to-day rotting at a dock in Charlestown—directly in the face of the wharf from which she was launched, and which still, a hundred and seven years later, bears her name—rotting there, a useless, disappearing hulk, while, in flagrant violation of international ethics, we have given the name of Chesapeake—a name we lost in fair fight—to a new vessel, and that new vessel, perpetuating the memory of disgrace and defeat, is used, of all possible purposes, as a training ship for our naval cadets! The mere mention of the fact suggests an inquiry into the mental condition of a Congress and Department which for a moment permit such a disgraceful anomaly.

"Perpetrated in the name of economy it is a case of monumental ingratitude. Would it have cost more to rehabilitate the Constitution than to build a new Chesapeake? This question is one very opportune in Boston on this 30th of August; following hard on Guerrière day it is a question not easy to answer. And, again, the old wooden frigate Constellation, long in use at Newport, has just been put out of commission and now lies in dry dock at the Brooklyn Navy-Yard in process of renewal. From the day on which the Constellation was launched, September 7, 1797—scarcely six short weeks before the launching of the Constitution—her history has been mainly one of mishaps. Always well fought, her flag, unlike that of the Chesapeake, never came down to an antagonist; but, the direct opposite in this respect of the Constitution, her unluckiness was uniform—some trick of fate always intervened to make her victories valueless or turn them against her. During the entire war of 1812–14 she was blockaded in the Chesapeake; and while the name of the Constitution, as she went from battle to battle, became synonymous with victory, that of the Constellation was suggestive only of hope deferred and final disappointment. Never once during the struggle did her pennon fly in mid-ocean.

"During the last session of Congress, at the instance of a New England Senator, an item was inserted in the naval appropriation bill, as framed and passed by the House of Representatives, providing for the repair of the Constitution—'Old Ironsides.' It met with no opposition in the Senate. Later the bill, as amended, went into the hands of a conference committee, and when it emerged therefrom the Constitution item was no longer there. It had been stricken out at the instance of the conferees on the part of the House on the grounds of economy. Provision was made for the repair and maintenance of the Chesapeake, a sailing ship commemorative of the deepest disgrace and most mortifying defeat this nation ever was called upon to endure, and use is found for her; but the frigate which, in the hour of deepest discouragement, restored self-respect and hope to the United States, was, for considerations of thrift, doomed to rot at a wharf. The Constellation—unlucy sister of the lucky 'Ironsides'—could be sent to Brooklyn to be restored, but the old 'fighting frigate of 1812' was pronounced not worth preserving.

"On this 30th of August, of all days in the year, is it not timely, as well as appropriate, for Bostonians to inquire of Congress and the Navy Department, Why is this thus?"

COAL-MINING INTERESTS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. RAYNER. I present a memorial, being an answer of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company of the charge that was made against them by the Red Rock Fuel Company. I desire to say that I present it by request. I have no knowledge of any of the facts embraced in the controversy, but I should like to have the answer printed in the RECORD, as the original charge was printed in the RECORD at the time it was made.

There being no objection, the memorial was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD COMPANY, LAW DEPARTMENT,
Baltimore, Md., February 10, 1906.

HON. ISIDOR RAYNER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The misstatements made by others as to the case of the Red Rock Fuel Company v. The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, recently decided by the Interstate Commerce Commission and now pending in the circuit court of the United States for the northern district of West Virginia, and the use of those misstatements to influence legislation in Congress, seem to justify a departure from this company's custom of refraining from outside discussion of matters pending in the courts. I beg, therefore, to lay before you this statement of the facts in the case and of this company's position in the matter, and to request that you give this statement the same publicity in the Senate as was given the statement of the president of the Red Rock Fuel Company.

THE FACTS.

The Red Rock Fuel Company was incorporated January 30, 1905, to take over coal lands purchased by its promoters January 18, 1905. The lands lie in Upshur County, W. Va., a half mile or more north of that fork of the railroad of the West Virginia and Pittsburgh Railroad Company extending from Weston to Buckhannon. The fuel company admits that when its promoters purchased they knew that the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company had informed their predecessors in title that it could not afford railroad facilities in connection with their property until it could enlarge its equipment. However, the Red Rock Fuel Company immediately notified the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company that the Red Rock Company would at once locate a coal tipple 4,000 feet from the railroad and construct a single track therefrom to the railroad, and demanded that the Baltimore and Ohio, operating the West Virginia and Pittsburgh Railroad, permit or make a physical connection with the new track and furnish cars at the tipple for the shipment of coal. The West Virginia and Pittsburgh Railroad is a single-track road, and the proposed point of connection is approximately midway between stations (2 miles from each) and where there is no track other than the single main track. From the direction of Weston the nearest coal operation is distant by rail 29.2 miles, with intermediate grades so heavy as to be practically prohibitive. From the Buckhannon side the nearest coal operation is 21 miles by rail and on the Grafton and Belington Railroad. In 1904 a line of railroad was completed from Lemley Junction, on the Grafton and Belington, to a connection with the West Virginia and Pittsburgh Railroad at Buckhannon, a distance of 13 miles. There is no coal on this 13 miles of road. No coal is hauled from or over the line of railroad between Weston and Buckhannon, with which the Red Rock Company seeks connection, and no rates for coal in carloads have ever been made or published from or over that line.

Where there is a coal field sufficiently developed to require special service the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company furnishes special coal-switching service to place empty cars at the coal tipples and to take away loaded cars. Where such a special service exists the railroad company can switch cars to a tipple located away from the company's track, even as far as 4,000 feet, although such a distance would be unusual. Without such special switching service the railroad company can not switch to and from a tipple so located. To attempt it in connection with regular trains would involve leaving the train on the main track while the locomotive and crew were gone a mile away. To perform the service demanded by the Red Rock Company, therefore, would require a special switching service for 20 miles each way.

The answer of the railroad company to the demand of the Red Rock Company was the same that had been given to their predecessors in title, as they well knew, viz, that until the railroad company could enlarge its equipment it could not provide special service to develop a new coal territory, but must stop at the discharge of its legal obligations as a carrier. They were told at the same time that the railroad company was taking steps to make large additions to its equipment. Thereupon the Red Rock Company filed its complaint before the Interstate Commerce Commission. After hearing, at which none of the above-stated facts was disputed, the Commission decided that the refusal of the railroad company to permit the track connection and to switch cars to the Red Rock Company's tipple subjected that company to undue and unreasonable prejudice and disadvantage.

DECISION OF THE COMMISSION.

The Commission's decision is based upon two entirely untrue and unsupported assumptions which the Commission found as facts, and upon which it specifically predicated its conclusions of unjust discrimination and undue preference. Those two assumptions are:

First. That the Red Rock Company's undeveloped lands are in the Fairmont district and in situation substantially similar to the coal properties in that district already developed and in operation.

Second. That the switch connection and service demanded by the Red Rock Company are under circumstances and conditions similar to those of the operations in the Fairmont district.

1. The Red Rock lands are not in the district of coal development known as the "Fairmont district," but in an entirely distinct, undeveloped region, and form part of a vast area of virgin coal lands more or less adjacent to the Baltimore and Ohio's lines in West Virginia. The mere bald claim made by its officers that the Red Rock lands are in the Fairmont district is unavailable in face of the plain and fixed facts of their geographical location and their situation with respect to the lines of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. If developed to-day, they would be the pioneer operation of a new district, as well as the first operation in Upshur County, where they are located. They are located not adjacent to, but about three-quarters of a mile from, the line of the West Virginia and Pittsburg Railroad, the nearest coal operation on which is 30 miles distant, the nearest on the Grafton and Belington (with which the West Virginia and Pittsburg is connected by the Lemley cut-off) being about 20 miles distant by rail. To show how completely the Commission mistook the facts with reference to the location of this property, the railroad situation, and the history and present status of coal development, I quote the following from its report and opinion:

"The lines between Buckhannon and Grafton were constructed by defendant or its subsidiary companies particularly for the purpose of developing coal lands and securing coal traffic, but other traffic is now carried over them to some extent by defendant." (11 I. C. C. R., 444.)

As a matter of fact, the line which gave connection between Buckhannon and Grafton (the Lemley cut-off) was not built for the purpose of developing coal lands and securing coal traffic, but for the purpose of accommodating other traffic of the Baltimore and Ohio hitherto moving over the West Virginia and Pittsburg via Clarksburg, and if shipments should be made from the Red Rock property they would be the first coal shipments ever made over this line from this district. No rates for coal in carloads have ever been made or published over this line. This fundamental error of the Commission is again repeated a little later, as follows:

"A large number of these operations or coal mines are connected with defendant's main line between Buckhannon and Grafton, one at Century being nearer than any other to complainant's mine, the distance between the two being, in a straight line, only about 4½ miles. Mountainous conditions, however, would render it impracticable to connect Century by railroad with complainant's mine." (11 I. C. C. R., 446.)

As a matter of fact, the number of coal operations on the Grafton and Belington below Grafton is comparatively small, and is not, as indicated, "a large number" of the operations in West Virginia or in the Fairmont district, if in that district at all. It is entirely misleading to say that any of these operations are located on the Baltimore and Ohio's main line between Buckhannon and Grafton, as none of them are located on the line connecting Buckhannon with the Grafton and Belington Railroad, and have no relation at all to the Buckhannon line. The Commission also takes pains to dwell upon the wholly immaterial fact that the distance between the Red Rock property and the Century property is only 4½ miles in a straight line across high mountains, but does not state in that connection that by railroad the distance between the two is 20 miles, and that they lie in separate and distinct districts.

2. The Commission's second assumption, which, as well as the first, it calls a finding of fact, is that switch connections and switching service with coal properties in the Fairmont district are under substantially similar circumstances and conditions to those demanded by the Red Rock Company. The Commission does not specify to which operation or operations in the Fairmont district the Red Rock property is similarly circumstanced, its failure to do so being, doubtless, the result of inability to name such operations. Nowhere does there exist a switching service of 20 miles each way, or anything like it.

The Commission begs the whole question thus:

"As this case stands, we must assume that complainant has complied with the terms of every condition which defendant might reasonably impose in the premises." (11 I. C. C. R., 456.)

In its answer and at the hearing the Baltimore and Ohio vigorously objected to the location of the Red Rock tipple nearly a mile from its line of railroad, and to being required to make arrangements for serving a coal property at which a legal tender of shipments could not be made to the railroad company in the usual way upon or adjacent to its line of railroad. This assumption of the Commission's, therefore, was made not only in face of the facts of the case, but also of the law applicable to common carriers and interstate commerce.

The Red Rock property is not only in a new and distinct district, but also presents local conditions peculiar to itself, having no relation to operations in the Fairmont district.

3. Another error made by the Commission which, it is believed, largely influenced its assumption of jurisdiction and its decision in this case, is embodied in the following mistaken finding of fact:

"Defendant is a common carrier of interstate traffic and interested largely not only in the transportation of coal, but also as a stockholder in several large coal companies whose properties are located in the vicinity of defendant's lines of railway in the Fairmont district and elsewhere." (11 I. C. C. R., 440.)

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company is not a stockholder in any coal company, large or small, located in the vicinity of or on its lines of railway in the Fairmont district. It has for many years owned a majority of the stock of the Consolidation Coal Company, a Maryland corporation. In 1903 the Consolidation Coal Company acquired a bare majority of the stock of the Fairmont Coal Company. The Commission finds that the alleged stockholding of the Baltimore and Ohio in the Fairmont Coal Company is the reason the Red Rock Company's demands have not been complied with. This finding is absolutely untrue, is based purely upon assumption, is not only unwarranted by the facts in the case, but these facts and the evidence taken by the Red Rock Company upon its own behalf completely negative the Commission's conclusions.

The Baltimore and Ohio's position with respect to the Red Rock Company was governed by the peculiar conditions surrounding the latter, especially its remote situation in a new and undeveloped coal district, in connection with the conditions surrounding the entire West Virginia coal situation on its lines, but was in no way dictated or influenced by any interest in the Fairmont Coal Company. The Red Rock proposition meant that, in order to serve the private interests of the coal operators or coal speculators connected with that company, the Baltimore and Ohio should arrange for the development of a new coal district in West Virginia when the older established districts on its line (the result of a natural economic development entirely apart from any railroad influence) were already developed greatly in excess of the Baltimore and Ohio's facilities and equipment. At the time the Red Rock proposition was presented the capacity of the mines already opened on the Baltimore and Ohio's lines in West Virginia for a period of fourteen months was 30,832,495 tons, while the shipments for the same period were 8,635,260 tons, the limiting factor being the lack of cars. If the Baltimore and Ohio had been required to take away part of its coal cars from other West Virginia operations and send them to the remote Red Rock operation, it would have decreased the service obtainable from its equipment, and would have caused additional hardship to the other coal operators, whose car supply would have been correspondingly reduced, a number of them being then unable, with the cars available, to fill yearly contracts theretofore made. Of course the Red Rock people look at the matter only from the point of view of their individual interests, and claim that the opening of one more development would not make very much difference, but to the railroad it is not only the question of the one new operation, but also of the precedent. If a proposed development 20 miles beyond any existing operation can demand such service, why not one 40, 50, 60 miles beyond?

The Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company has always recognized that its duty, as well as its interest, requires the development of the natural resources of West Virginia as rapidly as possible. The coal production has doubled in five years, largely because of its efforts. The vast area of undeveloped coal lands in West Virginia can not all be developed immediately, without reference to the situation or to the railroad company's facilities and equipment. The Baltimore and Ohio has endeavored to apply common-sense business principles to the handling of a situation forced upon it by circumstances largely unforeseen and beyond its control.

Since the receivership its record with respect to providing new equipment and facilities for handling traffic has been at least creditable, but the bituminous-coal development along its lines, particularly in West Virginia, has outstripped all railroad facilities. These conditions developed prior to 1903, and, indeed, prior to the formation of the Fairmont Coal Company, and the Baltimore and Ohio, in justice to all interests concerned, adopted the policy of granting new switch connections only in cases where the similarity of conditions entailed the legal obligations so to do. This conservative policy it applied to the Red Rock proposition when presented, as it had applied it to many other propositions of a similar character.

As a matter of fact, the Fairmont Coal Company has received no better treatment with respect to switch connections than has the Red Rock Company. No new switch connections have been made for the Fairmont Coal Company, those which have been granted having been with other operators under conditions which gave the applicants the legal right to have them—conditions which do not apply to the Red Rock Company. The Baltimore and Ohio has consistently endeavored to fulfill its duties and obligations as a common carrier. It recognizes the full force of its legal obligations and duties as a carrier to accord fair and impartial treatment to all shippers served by it, and in no way has it accorded any undue advantage or preference to the Fairmont Coal Company. A striking proof of this will be found in the fact that in no year since 1902 has the Fairmont Coal Company shipped as much coal as it did in the year 1902, and that since that time the shipments of other operators in the region have been greater in proportion than those of the Fairmont Coal Company. It is true that the Fairmont Coal Company's shipments are large, but that is simply because at the time of its organization it took in a large part of the mines then operating in West Virginia, with the facilities that belonged to them. This organization was a natural commercial evolution effected without any connection with the railroad company.

With respect to extracts of testimony printed by the president of the Red Rock Company, I have only to say that, read out of their connection with and away from the adequate explanations of every one of the points he develops, they produce—as can always be done by skillful extracts from testimony—a thoroughly misleading impression. The inference sought to be drawn from the supposed control of the Pennsylvania Railroad over coal production in West Virginia is completely negatived by the fact that that coal production has doubled in five years, increasing in greater proportion than in any other coal field in the country. There is nothing in the record or in the facts of the case indicating any influence exercised by the Pennsylvania Railroad in this matter, and even the report of the Interstate Commerce Commission entirely disregards and makes no mention of the complainant's irrelevant allusions to the Pennsylvania Railroad during the progress of the trial.

I ask your indulgence for troubling you with this communication as to a matter in which you have no concern, and beg to remain,

Yours, very truly,

HUGH S. BOND, JR.,
Second Vice-President Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. McCUMBER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 8213) granting an increase of pension to William Monteith;

A bill (H. R. 2174) granting an increase of pension to Nathaniel Buchanan;

A bill (H. R. 5028) granting an increase of pension to Samuel P. Carll;

A bill (H. R. 3315) granting an increase of pension to Lewis L. Daugherty;

A bill (H. R. 650) granting an increase of pension to Felix G. Stidger;

A bill (H. R. 648) granting a pension to Charles Falbisaner;

A bill (H. R. 1287) granting an increase of pension to John D. Moore;

A bill (H. R. 1200) granting an increase of pension to John G. Parker;

A bill (H. R. 12016) granting an increase of pension to James Cassady;

A bill (H. R. 6178) granting an increase of pension to Carl W. Block;

A bill (H. R. 10477) granting an increase of pension to James B. Babcock; and

A bill (H. R. 10476) granting a pension to Charles T. Hesler.

Mr. DUBOIS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 11783) for the establishment of town sites and for the sale of lots within the common lands of the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indians in Oklahoma, reported it without amendment.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 5830) granting an increase of pension to Sylvenus Hardy;

A bill (H. R. 5855) granting an increase of pension to Francis L. Brown;

A bill (H. R. 6117) granting an increase of pension to Elizabeth Dill;

A bill (H. R. 6109) granting an increase of pension to William H. Ackert;

A bill (H. R. 3403) granting an increase of pension to George A. Baker; and

A bill (H. R. 2762) granting an increase of pension to William Chandler.

Mr. PILES, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (H. R. 6226) granting an increase of pension to George Bruner;

A bill (H. R. 8251) granting an increase of pension to Abel S. Thompson;

A bill (H. R. 13457) granting an increase of pension to William M. McCay;

A bill (H. R. 5640) granting an increase of pension to Abraham Mathews;

A bill (H. R. 4886) granting an increase of pension to Marquis De Lafayette Burket;

A bill (H. R. 4878) granting an increase of pension to Isaac H. Witherwax;

A bill (H. R. 4764) granting an increase of pension to Ahijah Brown; and

A bill (H. R. 1359) granting an increase of pension to Henry M. Robinson.

Mr. ALGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 1230) granting an increase of pension to Eugene Gaskill;

A bill (S. 2096) granting an increase of pension to Nathaniel R. Kent; and

A bill (S. 3626) granting a pension to Catherine Coyle.

Mr. ALGER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1227) granting an increase of pension to Henry J. Patterson, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 721) granting an increase of pension to Orange S. Mason, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 4131) granting an increase of pension to John Connor;

A bill (H. R. 5658) granting an increase of pension to Joseph Nichols;

A bill (H. R. 5647) granting an increase of pension to Peter Wetterich;

A bill (H. R. 3425) granting an increase of pension to Warren A. Blye; and

A bill (H. R. 11842) granting an increase of pension to James M. Noble.

Mr. LODGE. I am directed by the Committee on the Philippines, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 13104) to amend an act entitled "An act to revise and amend the tariff laws of the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1905, to report it without amendment. I ask that the House report may be made the report of the committee. I send a copy of the House report to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2724) for the relief of Delia B. Stuart, widow of John Stuart, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON PACIFIC ISLANDS AND PORTO RICO.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. FORAKER on the 19th instant, reported it without amendment, and it was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such testimony as may be taken by the committee or its subcommittees in connection with bills pending before it, and to have the same printed for its use, such stenographer to be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

COAL CLAIMS IN BATAN, PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. LODGE. I am authorized by the Committee on the Philippines, to whom was referred the bill (S. 3690) to provide for the purchase of certain coal lands in the Philippine Islands and to authorize the lease of same and of the Batan Military Reservation for the purpose of securing a local coal supply to the United States Government in the Philippine Islands, to report it favorably.

A precisely identical bill has just come over from the House, and I report the House bill in lieu of the Senate bill, with the House report, which I ask may be printed as the report of the Senate committee, and that the Senate bill may be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the bill from the House of Representatives.

The bill (H. R. 12864) to provide for the purchase of certain coal claims in the island of Batan, in the Philippine Islands, was read twice by its title.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the House bill may be substituted for the Senate bill which I have reported, and that the Senate bill be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. LODGE. I desire merely, in connection with the two bills, to give notice that day after to-morrow, in the morning hour, I shall ask the Senate to take up the House bill, for if any action is to be had upon it, it must be had immediately. The bill passed the House without division, on the unanimous report of the committee, and the report of the committee here is unanimous, and it must be disposed of if it is to be of any avail.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WARNER introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 4566) granting an increase of pension to Frank J. Verdot;

A bill (S. 4588) granting an increase of pension to William R. Coon.

Mr. WARNER introduced a bill (S. 4589) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of John C. Bennett; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOPKINS introduced a bill (S. 4590) to provide for the purchase of a site for and erection of a public building at Centralia, Marion County, Ill.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. PILES introduced a bill (S. 4591) providing for the establishment of a life-saving station in the vicinity of Point Granville, on the coast of Washington; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BURROWS introduced a bill (S. 4592) granting a pension to Lydia E. Sutton; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HALE introduced a bill (S. 4593) for the relief of Francis J. Cleary, a midshipman in the United States Navy; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MONEY introduced a bill (S. 4594) for the relief of the estate of John T. McCord, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. TILLMAN introduced a bill (S. 4595) granting an increase of pension to Amos McManus; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LODGE introduced a bill (S. 4596) to encourage and temporarily assist the construction, equipment, operation, and maintenance of railroads in the district of Alaska, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a joint resolution (S. R. 34) to provide for the publication of the names of the heads of families returned at the First Census of the United States; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on the Census.

ESTATE OF SAMUEL E. BRATTON.

Mr. BACON submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Claims:

Resolved, That the claim of the legal representatives of Samuel E. Bratton, deceased (Senate bill 1371), be, and the same hereby is, referred to the Court of Claims under the provisions of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1887, commonly known as the "Tucker Act."

PORTS OF CALIFORNIA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate amendments from the House of Representatives to a Senate bill, and desires the attention of the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS].

The amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3318) to allow the entry and clearance of vessels at San Luis Obispo, Port Harford, and Monterey, Cal., were, in line 8, after the word "petroleum," to insert "and its products" and in line 10 to strike out all after "entry" down to and including line 11.

Mr. PERKINS. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments made by the House of Representatives to the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

ELIJAH SPANGLER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the United States be requested to return to the House of Representatives the bill (H. R. 1059) granting an increase of pension to Elijah Spangler.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary:

H. R. 10853. An act to prohibit gambling in the Territories; and

H. R. 11501. An act to amend an act to provide for circuit and district courts of the United States at Albany, Ga.

H. R. 12064. An act to amend section 7 of an act entitled "An act to provide for a permanent Census Office," approved March 6, 1902, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Census.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed, and the Calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. MONEY. Before going to that business, I should like to have consent to have printed 250 copies of the amendment I offered to what is known as the "Heyburn bill." The copies are exhausted, I am informed, and there is a demand for additional copies.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi asks that 250 copies of his amendment to Senate bill 88, commonly known as the "pure-food bill," be printed. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, under the unanimous-consent rule of yesterday it was agreed that at 3 o'clock to-day Senate bill 88 should come up under the ten-minute rule. I suppose that agreement was not intended to preclude it from being taken up before that time under the general rule for consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator can have the bill taken up now by unanimous consent.

Mr. KEAN. I think it was distinctly understood that it was to come up immediately after the routine morning business to-day.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. But the unanimous-consent agreement applied only to the time after 3 o'clock.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have risen for the purpose of asking unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 88.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 88) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have understood from the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that he desires to take up the amendment offered by him at this time. However, I do not see him in his seat.

I desire this morning to offer a committee amendment of which I gave notice when I first called up the bill for consideration. It is for the purpose of perfecting the language in the latter part of section 4.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5 of the reprint, line 3, after the word "and" and before the word "public," insert the words "after final judgment;" on page 5, line 4, strike out the word "the," at the beginning of the line, and insert the word "such;" on page 5, line 4, after the word "as," insert the words "may be prescribed by;" on page 5, line 5, after the word "regulations," insert "by the Department of Agriculture;" and strike out, after the word "Agriculture," in the last amendment, down to the beginning of line 9.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will ask, while the Senator from Massachusetts is otherwise engaged, that the letter which I send to the desk may be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho requests the reading of a letter. Without objection, the Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

ATLANTA, GA., February 14, 1906.

Hon. Mr. HEYBURN, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: Would you kindly have forwarded to Mr. John A. Green, president National Retail Grocers' Association, of Cleveland, Ohio, a copy of the Heyburn Senate bill, No. 88, introduced December 14, 1905?

As chairman of the pure-food committee of the National Retail Grocers' Association, I wish to inform you that your bill meets my hearty approval and indorsement. We have requested the retail distributors of food products throughout the United States to write their Representatives in Washington, urging them to support the passage of this measure. Our committee stands in readiness to go to Washington at any time, should our services be required.

Yours, very truly, A. W. FARLINGER,
Chairman Pure Food Committee,
National Retail Grocers' Association.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire also to send to the desk for reading a resolution bearing upon this question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

As the Heyburn bill (S. 88) has been reported on favorably by a special committee of the national legislative council of the American Medical Association, and as we daily see the necessity of legislation against fraudulent foods and drugs in order that the public health may be preserved, and as such legislation has been annulled in previous sessions, owing to hostility in the United States Senate: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the Omaha-Douglas County Medical Society, will, individually and collectively, do all in our power, both morally and politically, to support this measure and also that our Senator, Mr. MILLARD, be strongly urged to give this bill his support and that a copy of this resolution be sent to Senator MILLARD.

[SEAL.] WARREN H. SLABAUGH, President.
JOSEPH M. AIKIN, Secretary.

OMAHA, NEBR., February 13, 1906.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will state that that was sent to me by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. MILLARD], and I have taken the liberty on his reference to use it.

Mr. President, while waiting for the Senator from Massachusetts to take up his amendment I desire to call the attention of Senators to section 4 of this proposed act.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator from Idaho will yield to me for just a moment, as he is——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. As the Senator is introducing resolutions, I simply desire also to introduce a resolution in reference to this subject and have it read. I will say, in the first instance, that the resolution is one on behalf of the National Retail Grocers' Association of the United States, and represents an immense body. It is a letter written to Mr. Barrett, editor of the American Grocer, who requested that it should be presented to me. I ask that it be read in connection with the resolution that has just been read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection the Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

ATLANTA, GA., February 14, 1906.

EDITOR AMERICAN GROCER, NEW YORK: In reply to your favor of recent date would beg to say that I agree with you and that I am very much disappointed at the action of our convention in laying on the table the resolution indorsing the Heyburn bill. This bill and this bill only embraces all points that the retail grocers of the United States have been contending for during the past twenty years. We have in this bill the protecting clause for which we so strenuously contested, and surely every retail distributor of food products would protect himself by taking a guaranty from the manufacturer or jobber from whom he purchases. What more could we ask?

President John A. Green has appointed me chairman of the pure-food committee of the National Retail Grocers' Association for the ensuing year, and I can assure you that our committee will continue to work in the future as we have in the past, concentrating our efforts upon the only fair, honest bill, a bill which has been before Congress for the past five years, a bill which is indorsed by the honest manufacturer, and there are thousands of them, a bill which has been indorsed several times by the National Retail Grocers' Association, a bill which is indorsed by Secretary Wilson, of the Department of Agriculture, and which meets the approval of the President of the United States, and the only bill which has a shadow of hope of passing. I can assure you, Mr. Editor, and I reiterate, our efforts will be concentrated upon this, and I trust the influence of the National Association will sustain us in working for the Heyburn bill, known as Senate bill No. 88, and now before the Senate of the United States.

I trust that through the editorial columns of the American Grocer, as well as the editorial columns of all the trade papers throughout this nation, we may have one strong appeal made to the retail distributors of food products in every State and Territory of the Union to at once wire and write their Representatives, urging them to support this measure. This bill will pass during the present session if the retail grocers of this country concentrate their efforts and do their full duty. I commend your efforts in the past and trust that in the future you will cooperate with us in one concentrated effort for the passage of this equitable and important bill. Should this bill pass during the present session of Congress the grocers will have a prestige in the nation that they never dreamed of. We are battling for the right and the right always wins.

Yours, most sincerely, A. W. FARLINGER,
Chairman Pure Food Committee,
National Retail Grocers' Association.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to send to the desk another resolution to have read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

HOMŒOPATHIC MEDICAL SOCIETY OF THE COUNTY OF KINGS,
Borough of Brooklyn, New York, February 17, 1906.

Resolution adopted by the Homœopathic Medical Society of the County of Kings February 13, 1906.

Whereas the prosperity and happiness of a nation depend more on the health of the people than any other factor, and the health of the people is vitally dependent upon the purity of the food products and medicinal agents: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the Homœopathic Medical Society of the County of Kings, do hereby pledge ourselves to do all in our power to arouse public interest in the Heyburn pure-food bill, which is now before the United States Senate; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge our Senators and Representatives to use their influence in every way to secure the passage of this bill; also, that copies of this resolution be forwarded to the Senators from this State and Representatives from Kings County and to Senator HEYBURN.

RALPH I. LLOYD, Secretary.

Mr. HEYBURN. I send to the desk and desire to have read an article from a Chicago paper.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

FOR THE PURE-FOOD BILL—RESOLUTIONS PASSED BY THE NATIONAL EXHIBITORS AT CHICAGO.

CHICAGO, February 17, 1906.

Resolutions urging Congress to pass the Heyburn pure-food bill, now pending in the Senate, were adopted unanimously at a meeting held under the auspices of the National Dairy and Pure-Food Show interests yesterday.

The meeting was the first in a series of pure-food symposiums to be held during the continuance of the exhibit, and each of the six speakers strongly emphasized the urgent necessity of national legislation which will afford citizens protection against food products adulterated with aniline and coal-tar dyes.

It was declared that nothing short of a national law would be an adequate remedy against unscrupulous manufacturers and dealers in adulterated products, and it was urged that the public, especially the women of the country, make themselves acquainted with the nature of the goods they buy, and that they purchase nothing but the purest goods.

The resolutions were introduced by Paul Pierce, superintendent of the Government's exhibit at the show, who was made chairman of the meeting.

Nearly 200 persons, many of whom were women, attended the meeting. The speakers were G. Edward Fuller; Prof. J. M. Trueman, of the University of Illinois; Edward K. Slater, food commissioner of Minnesota; J. D. Miller, commissioner of health; Charles J. Whalen, and A. Hanby Jones, food commissioner of Illinois.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I believe the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] desires to take the floor at this time on the amendment heretofore offered by him, and I will yield to him.

Mr. LODGE. My amendment, on page 8, is pending. I hope it will be adopted by the Senate when it is voted on. It simply provides that the test of food products shall be made when they are in the condition in which they are actually consumed, and not in the condition in which they are necessarily transported. The amendment was drafted by Doctor Wiley. I do not mean to say that it is his amendment in any sense, but he drafted it in order that it might be put in proper form. It simply provides that where a preservative is used, which it is necessary to remove mechanically or by maceration in water or otherwise, the provisions of this proposed act shall be construed to apply only when such products are ready for consumption. That seems to me a perfectly reasonable proposition. It does not affect the bill at all. It simply prescribes the condition as to which the terms of the bill shall apply. It relates directly to the preservatives used for meats and fish.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. I have received a letter from a valued constituent of mine on this subject in the same direction in which the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is now speaking. The amendment having only the purpose which the Senator from Massachusetts has stated, what is the objection to it?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, if it were confined to the class of articles to which the Senator from Massachusetts has referred, there might be no objection, but the amendment is in general terms. There are some articles which might safely, for the purpose of transportation, be surrounded by conditions such as are anticipated by this amendment, while there are other articles that could not be. If it were simply applied to the wrappings of fish and meat for the purpose of protecting them in shipment or preserving them under the conditions of shipment, it might be that if the conditions were limited to that class of articles it would do no harm; I am not sure. It would depend on how far it was carried.

I understand that the packers of meats and fish desire to inclose those articles in wrappers that are saturated with or in some way contain these preservatives which are not supposed to penetrate the articles which they inclose. Now, if the provision was so guarded that this wrapping was of such a character as would not injure the articles of food, it would do no harm, but the amendment is couched in general terms. There are a great many things that would be permanently injured by reason of coming in contact with these preservatives. For instance, if the preservative was confined to the wrapper alone, so that it might not penetrate the substance, but if it was rubbed in and could only be removed by a process of soaking or boiling or washing, then, of course, it would be at the mercy of the care that was taken to remove it by those who were preparing it for use.

Mr. LODGE. Does the Senator suggest to limit the provision to fish and meat products?

Mr. HEYBURN. Just let me refer to the provision. It is on page 8, I believe.

Mr. LODGE. On page 8.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I will suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts an amendment to his amendment which would contain these words:

Provided, That the package or wrapper containing it shall also contain directions for removing such preservative.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to that, of course.

Mr. McCUMBER. That, it seems to me, would at least afford a remedy.

Mr. LODGE. That, I think, would cover the objection of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. HEYBURN. I will make this suggestion; I think this is necessary in order to cover my objection: The word "application," in line 22, is of an indefinite and rather elastic scope. The "application" might be in the wrapper, but it might be a saturation of the article itself. Now, if instead of saying "by an application," say "by an external wrapper"——

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no. That would destroy the whole purpose of the amendment.

Mr. HOPKINS. The amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota will, I think, remove the objection.

Mr. LODGE. I think so.

Mr. McCUMBER. I simply made that as a suggestion. The Senator's amendment provides:

Provided further, That when in the preparation of food products for shipment they are preserved by an external application applied in such manner that the preservative is necessarily removed mechanically or by maceration in water or otherwise, the provisions of this act shall be construed as applying only when said products are ready for consumption.

I propose to leave out the latter part, after the word "otherwise," and add:

Provided, That the package or wrapper containing it shall also contain directions for removing such preservative.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator proposes to insert that language after the word "otherwise," in line 24?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes. My point is simply this: You may use boracic acid. It may be in the wrapper, and it may penetrate a very little, if any, into the ham. Otherwise it could be washed off; and if that direction was on the wrapper itself, or the cloth covering the ham, the people would be protected, as they should be.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I will accept the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], and modify my amendment by inserting, after the word "otherwise," on page 8, in line 24, where it reads "the preservative is necessarily removed mechanically or by maceration in water or otherwise"—to insert at that point:

And when the package or wrapper containing it shall contain directions for removing such preservative or application.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's proposed modification to his amendment will be stated at the desk.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, I suppose I am at liberty to make the modification so that the question on the amendment will be put in that modified form?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That is the right of the Senator. The modification of the amendment will be stated at the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 24, in the new print of the bill, after the word "otherwise," it is proposed to insert:

And when the package or wrapper containing it shall contain directions for removing such preservative or application.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment as modified will be ordered to be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator from Idaho is ready to accept the amendment, I shall be very glad to have a vote upon it. I do not want to modify it any further in view of the amendment I have accepted.

Mr. HOPKINS. It would not be in order to vote upon the amendment now.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not think I would be at liberty to accept the amendment, Mr. President.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, no. On reflection, I do not think the Senator can even accept it now.

Mr. President, as I am on the floor, I have a further amendment, on page 10, which I should like to offer and to which, I understand, the committee has no objection; but of course it will have to be accepted to-morrow. I should like to extend this provision, if the committee has no objection—and I do not think they will—by inserting, in line 22, after the word "alcohol," the words "or of opium in any form."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 22, in the proposed amendment heretofore submitted by Mr. LODGE, after the word "alcohol," insert the words "or of opium in any form."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie upon the table.

Mr. CLAY. Let me ask the Senator from what he is reading?

Mr. LODGE. From the new print of the bill.

Mr. CLAY. On what page?

Mr. LODGE. On page 10, line 22.

Then the other amendment is simply a repetition. It is, on page 11, line 5, after the word "alcohol," to insert "or of opium in any form."

I think there is no objection to the amendment as modified. There is no need of discussing these amendments. They will be accepted, I understand, at the proper time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie upon the table.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, when I yielded to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] I was proceeding to consider section 4 of this bill. I feel it due to the conditions to make a statement in regard to the particular provisions of this section, because the newspapers, at least to some extent, and those who are opposing this bill generally, are charging that by these provisions the power is placed in the hands of one man—namely, the Chief Chemist, or head of the Bureau of Chemistry—to determine standards, and that it is within his power, under the provisions of this bill, to proscribe articles of commerce and denounce them in such manner as to seriously affect or injure the trade in them. If there is anything that this bill, and especially that this section of it, does not provide, it is for the fixing of standards by anybody. If there is anything that is not provided for or permitted under this bill, it is that the Chief Chemist, or the Chief of the Bureau of Chemistry, shall have power to denounce anything under any circumstances or to place a ban upon anything or, as I stated yesterday, to place the ban of disapproval upon anything. He is given no such power. He is simply the agent of the courts to gather testimony upon these questions for the purpose of being used at the trial in the court room and nowhere else.

He publishes no bulletins in regard to his labors or his investigations of such articles as may come under his charge for that purpose; he takes no proceeding; he exercises no authority either to denounce an article, to stop commerce in it, or in any way to affect it. I feel it due to this bill and to the subject to make this statement at this time in order that if any Senator can find anything in this bill upon which to base a different interpretation, he may have the opportunity of doing so, and in order that the country may understand that this bill must not be confused with bills which have been introduced in this and in other branches of the legislative department of this Government to provide for the fixing of standards. This bill fixes no standard upon anything; it authorizes no officer to fix any standard. It provides that the courts, and the courts alone, may determine whether or not an article is contraband under the provisions of this act. The object in avoiding any possible construction that might be held to be fixing a standard was that the bill might never come in conflict with the pure-food legislation of the various States. The States have established different standards, and they have a right to do so. Inasmuch as those standards vary, it would be impossible for an act of Congress, a general law, to avoid some conflict with some of those State laws if you should undertake to fix standards.

The substitute offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] undertakes to fix standards and prescribe what per cent of this or what per cent of the other may be permissible or may be forbidden. We can not accept that substitute because it would violate the underlying principle, one of the strongest principles of this bill; it would attempt to fix standards or authorize some one to do so.

The amendment offered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] in regard to condensed milk undertakes to fix a standard as to the percentage of solids, the butter fats that may be contained in that product. That is obnoxious to the spirit and the principle of this bill which seeks to avoid that. The percentage of alcohol or the percentage of any other article to be found in a substance subject to examination under the provisions of this bill is avoided. I repeat the Chief Chemist and the agencies of the Department of Agriculture, of the Department of Commerce and Labor, and of the Treasury Department of the United States are mere agencies for the purpose of gathering information throughout the country through the present existing machinery of those Departments, without the creation of any new Department, without the creation of any board, without the creation of any additional machinery of Government to gather these specimens for test, and that test simply consists in determining the existence or nonexistence of a fact.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is so well informed on this subject that I want him to give me a little information, which, no doubt, he can do. It has been suggested that in the Department of Agriculture they are engaged in the matter of fixing standards. I know nothing about it. If the Senator will turn to page 6—I presume this is entirely explainable—on line 22, he will find the bill speaks of "the standard of strength, quality, or purity to be plainly stated on the box, bottle," and so forth; and in lines 24 and 25, "if the strength or purity fall below the professed standard or quality under which it is sold." I presume the Senator can explain that in conformity with the statement he has just made that there is to be no standard.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think I can explain it. The professed standard is fixed by the manufacturer or the seller. The language of the measure is—it differs from the standard of strength, quality, or purity, as determined by the test laid down in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary.

That is not the fixing of a standard within the scope of the criticism that has been urged against this bill, because that is a standard fixed by the recognized dictionary or scientific work, and is recognized as the rule by which the whole country is governed.

Mr. GALLINGER. That relates to drugs.

Mr. HEYBURN. That relates to drugs. Those are recognized works of determination, the result of analyses and of experience combined. The other limitation to which the Senator has called my attention is:

Provided, That no drug not defined in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary shall be deemed to be adulterated under this provision if the standard of strength, quality, or purity be plainly stated upon the bottle, box, or other container thereof as originally packed.

There the manufacturer himself states the standard. This bill only requires him to tell the truth about it. In general aspect this bill might be termed "an act to compel the telling of the truth in regard to the business in which men are engaged."

Mr. GALLINGER. I assume that that proviso refers more particularly to so-called "proprietary medicines."

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; it is intended to cover them undoubtedly.

Mr. GALLINGER. They are compounds, and I do not see how the manufacturers can really state the standard of a package if they have got four or five or six or seven different ingredients in the mixture; they may be good or bad—I think they are generally bad—but how they can state the standard of the package or the purity of it is beyond me. I think they may show the different ingredients are pure, but just what standard they can fix I can not comprehend.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, if they can not do it, then they ought not, under any conditions, to be permitted to put their nostrums upon the market. If a man can not tell the public what he is offering them, he ought not to be allowed to offer it to them.

Now, referring to the clause to which the Senator has called my attention, on page 7, line 5:

Second. If its strength or purity fall below the professed standard or quality under which it is sold.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me call attention here to the fact that that provision would not affect a case where they do not have a professed standard, and, therefore, that would answer the question of the Senator from New Hampshire. If they sell these articles without any professed standard, then, of course, they would not be liable for misbranding, if they did not measure up to that standard.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I think the Senator from North Dakota does not quite comprehend this proviso. It provides that any drugs not defined by the United States Pharmacopœia or the National Formulary, which are the established and recognized authorities on this subject, shall have stated on the box or bottle or container the standard of strength, quality, or purity. I do not see that there is any exemption, and the Senator's suggestion that if they have not established a standard, they will not be required to do it, it seems to me, does not meet the objection.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator does not hold that the construction of that sentence would be that, if they did not place the standard upon it or did not state the standard of strength quality, or purity, it would follow that it was adulterated?

Mr. GALLINGER. I do hold to that because the proviso reads as follows:

Provided, That no drug not defined in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary shall be deemed to be adulterated under this provision if the standard of strength, quality, or purity be plainly stated upon the bottle, box, or other container thereof as originally packed.

So if the standard is not plainly stated upon it I think it would come under the ban. That would be my opinion.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think that it is so intended, and that is not my understanding of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think it should be so construed, because I do not think any unnamed nostrum should be sold upon the market as a professed curer of disease. I do not think any person should be permitted to offer upon the public market a medicine for professed relief against disease that had no statement as to what the medicine was. So that is a matter which I think the court will take care of.

Mr. GALLINGER. But, Mr. President, the difficulty is that the Senator by indirection is going to utterly destroy the so-called "patent-medicine business." If that is the purpose of this bill, why not state it? That is what this provision will do, according to my interpretation of it. I am not here to defend that class of people. I have very little confidence in their preparations, but they have rights under the law as it now exists, and if their business is to be destroyed, let us state it specifically, so that everybody will understand it.

Mr. HEYBURN. It would only destroy those who are unable, because of the facts, to state the strength, quality, or purity of their articles.

Mr. GALLINGER. And the standard.

Mr. HEYBURN. And the standard.

Mr. GALLINGER. They can not do it.

Mr. HEYBURN. If they can not do it, if they can not name the article, they ought not to be permitted to sell it.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is not a question of naming the article. In the first place, it is a very serious question whether we are going to require the druggists of this country who have compounds, some of which are not public, to disclose exactly what their formula may be; and, in the second place, the difficulty is in establishing a standard where there are two, three, four, five, or six different ingredients in the so-called "medicine." I do not see how that can be done. I think the word "standard" at least ought to be eliminated from that proviso.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think we can remedy that by inserting after the word "the," at the end of the second line, the word "professed;" so that it will read as follows:

Provided, That no drug not defined in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary shall be deemed to be adulterated under this provision if the professed standard of strength, quality, or purity be plainly stated upon the bottle, box, or other container thereof as originally packed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not think that covers it at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. If it has no professed standard, they will not be liable.

Mr. HEYBURN. We have absolutely provided against the charge that this would require the publication of the formula upon the bottle. In another section of the bill we have provided especially that the formula need not be printed.

Mr. GALLINGER. Well, then, will the Senator state—because I am seeking light on this subject—what he would expect these people to place on the bottles under this proviso?

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course, that would be as variable as the remedies. There is such infinite variety of these nostrums that the standards would vary according to the character of the mixture.

Mr. GALLINGER. If they simply state that this remedy is of a proper standard, that the quality is good, and it is pure, would that fulfill the requirements?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; they would have to conform to the particular medicine. I am not enough of a druggist, I do not know enough of the technicalities of medicine, to enable me to analyze that and say just exactly what would be required in each particular case; but I do say that that provision has been submitted to and approved by the medical board of the Medical Society of the United States and by innumerable minor medical associations, and I have had read from the desk this morning from both schools of medicine the unqualified approval of that provision.

Inasmuch as we of necessity went to those sources for information in framing a measure of this kind, I assume, the National Medical Association, the National Association of Druggists, the national associations of both schools of medicine having analyzed that provision, that there must be a plain and easy solution of the matter. I doubt if, outside of the Senator from New Hampshire, who is learned in the science of medicine, there is a Member of this body who could analyze.

Mr. GALLINGER. But the physicians who have examined this bill may not have had their attention called directly to this provision. I am not going to oppose it beyond repeating what I have just said, that, in my judgment, reading it as I do here to-day, if that proviso remains in the bill as it is now it will make it utterly impossible for the so-called "patent medicine" dealers to continue in business. If they are required to establish a standard, they can not do it.

It is impossible for them to do it. If the Senator thinks that provision ought to remain in the bill, I have no particular objection to it, because I think these men will find a remedy somehow. The Senator does not require them, in another provision of the bill, to disclose their formulæ. I think a bill passed one branch of the New Hampshire legislature last winter requiring them to do that thing. It did not become a law. There is a great deal of contention in certain quarters that they ought to do that for the benefit of the public. I do not know whether or not that would be good legislation. But this bill specifically excludes them from disclosing their formulæ, and yet it requires them, before their goods can enter into interstate commerce, to state a standard on the box, bottle, or container, and to make some sort of declaration about the strength and purity. It is not enough to say it is pure. I confess I do not know what they will do under the provisions of this section.

Mr. HEYBURN. I confess I am curious to know what the patent-medicine people will say on behalf of their nostrums. I have the same degree of curiosity as that expressed by the Senator. I will await with much interest the declaration these gentlemen will make on behalf of their admixtures.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; but that is not in controversy. It is not the question of nostrums, so called—the patent medicines put on the market. That is not the question at all. These men have rights under the law to-day. The Senator himself does not ask them to disclose their formulæ, but in my judgment here is a provision that will absolutely prevent them from entering interstate commerce with their goods, and I do not believe we ought to legislate in that way.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I was discussing the question as to the provisions of section 4 of the proposed act in regard to establishing standards, and I do not desire that the mind of the Senate shall be diverted very long from that proposition. I wish to have it understood that this bill does not permit the Chief Chemist of the Bureau of Chemistry to fix standards or to punish anybody, or to brand his goods as fraudulent, under any circumstances. It does not permit the Secretary of Agriculture to do it. It does not permit anyone except the court, after a trial by a jury, if the party shall appeal to that right, to brand the goods as being fraudulent or obnoxious to the provisions of this bill.

It seems to me no one can reasonably complain if, after a fair trial, upon notice, with the opportunity to produce all of the testimony that may be admissible under the rules of practice in the court, a man is adjudged to be guilty or not guilty of a violation of the law.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. This provision was placed in the bill before the Senator from Idaho came to the Senate, and it has since been reintroduced. I should like to explain briefly to the Senator from New Hampshire how it was placed in the bill, and for what purpose. I refer to the provision which the Senator from New Hampshire was just discussing.

Let me call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to this fact. It reads:

First. If, when a drug is sold under or by a name recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary, it differs from the standard of strength, quality, or purity, as determined by the test laid down in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary official at the time of investigation.

Now, there the old bill stopped. Parke, Davis & Co., manufacturers of drugs, had a representative before the Committee on Manufactures, and they asked that the provision be modified for this reason: They said:

We are manufacturing articles which of course are not under standard of the Pharmacopœia, but are of half standard and one-third. But we state it upon the vessels or the containers, and we wish to insert that so that we can manufacture the same articles with half the strength or quarter strength.

And therefore they had inserted this provision. It differs a little from the provision as it has been recopied. It was then provided:

Provided, That no drug—

It follows right on after determining that they must measure up to the standard of the Pharmacopœia. Then it provides:

That no drug shall be deemed to be adulterated under this provision if the standard of strength, quality, or purity be plainly stated upon the bottle, box, or other container thereof, although such standard may differ from that determined by the test laid down in the United States Pharmacopœia.

It seems to have undergone a little change in the reprint of the bill, which I confess I do not understand. I supposed it was exactly the same, and it was intended to apply, and I think it should be so modified that it will apply, simply to those which are provided in the Pharmacopœia, but do not measure up to it. That was the intention, and I think it was a clerical error.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think the Senators will be able, before the bill is voted upon, to arrange it so that it will be all right.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the object.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. With the permission of the Senator from Idaho, I should like to make an inquiry.

Mr. HEYBURN. I wish to send an amendment to the desk.

Mr. CLAY. Very well.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have with more care formulated the amendment which I sent up and which was hastily prepared, and I ask that it be substituted for the one previously sent up. Let it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, beginning of line 4, strike out the word "the" and insert the word "such;" after the word "as," in the same line, insert the words "may be prescribed by the;" in line 5, same page, after the word "regulations," insert the words "of the Department of Agriculture;" strike out the remainder of line 5, all of lines 6 and 7, all of line 8, excepting the last word, before which word insert "any;" in line 9 strike out the first three words "as may be;" after the word "act," in the same line, insert the words "shall be given;" and on page 5, after the word "and," in line 3, insert the words "after final judgment."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. CLAY. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho just for a moment to a careful analysis of section 2 of the bill.

SEC. 2. That the introduction into any State, Territory, District, or insular possession, from any other State, Territory, District, or insular possession, or from any foreign country, or the shipment to any foreign country of any article of food or drugs which is adulterated or misbranded, deleterious or poisonous, within the meaning of this act, is hereby prohibited—

That is clearly the subject of interstate commerce. Now, further—and any person, association of persons, or corporation who shall ship or deliver for shipment from any State, Territory, District, or insular possession to any other State, Territory, District, or insular possession, or shall export or offer to export the same to a foreign country, or who shall knowingly receive in any State, Territory, District, or insular possession of the United States from any other State, Territory, District, or insular possession of the United States, or from any foreign country—

That is clearly the subject of interstate commerce—"or who, having knowingly received." The word "knowingly" has been inserted, and I think it ought to have been inserted—or who, having knowingly received, shall deliver in original unbroken packages, or shall offer to deliver to any other person, persons, or corporation any such article, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor.

I want to ask the Senator this question: Under the latter provision of the bill, if a merchant shall receive by transportation from another State such packages, it is a violation of the proposed act. I understand that would be a part of the transportation from one State to another. But now, after a merchant has received and put in his store a stock of goods and sells them in the State where he receives them, I ask the Senator would Congress have any jurisdiction to make that act a penal offense?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; but I call the Senator's attention to the words beginning in line 5. It is in "original unbroken packages." It is confined to that class of packages. That is because of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that the jurisdiction of the United States under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution continues so long as the goods are in unbroken packages, and the State's jurisdiction does not attach so long as they are in unbroken packages, and that is the limitation which is found in the first two words in line 5. I think that is an answer to the Senator's suggestion.

Mr. CLAY. What line?

Mr. HEYBURN. Line 5, page 3. The provision to which the Senator's criticism is directed is limited by the term "unbroken packages," and that is necessary because of the two currents of jurisdiction, the national and the State. It refers to goods in unbroken packages, and until the package is broken the State jurisdiction does not attach. They are not in the merchant's stock of goods until the package is broken. That is the line of distinction, as I understand it, under the decisions of the courts, which we must, of course, keep in mind.

Mr. CLAY. The section says:

Who * * * shall deliver in original unbroken packages.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CLAY. That is in line 5.

Or shall offer to deliver to any other person, persons, or corporation any such article.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is, in unbroken packages.

Mr. CLAY. I am inclined to think "any such article" would refer to an "unbroken package."

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. It was intended that the bill should so provide.

Mr. CLAY. I had not noticed that feature of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; that is the intention.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. PILES. I do not believe the Senator from Idaho opposes my amendment on any tenable ground. He opposes it because it fixes a standard. I notice on page 7, line 5——

Mr. HEYBURN. What page?

Mr. PILES. Page 7, line 5:

If its strength or purity fall below the professed standard or quality under which it is sold.

The amendment I have proposed simply fixes a standard for Carnation Cream, which is largely manufactured on the Pacific coast; and if this bill is intended to do what it is claimed by its authors it will do—prevent the adulteration of food used in daily life—my amendment, it seems to me, ought to go into the bill.

The gentlemen who manufacture Carnation Cream contend that they are manufacturing the best article of this kind that is put on the market, and their intention is, according to a letter which they have written me on the subject, to compel other manufacturers to put forth a pure article. They state that their product contains the highest percentage of butter fat of any cream of this character manufactured in this country. They say:

We have manufactured the Carnation brand of evaporated cream for six years. At present we have the two largest plants on the Pacific coast, and are distributing Carnation Cream from St. Paul and

Chicago to New Orleans, and almost every intermediate jobbing point. We are particularly anxious that such a standard be fixed as will raise the standard of all evaporated creams. First, that they shall be pure—

That is what the Senator is contending for—

Second, that they shall contain not less than 7 per cent of butter fat. Third, that the total solids shall not be less or over 25 per cent.

The amendment I have proposed provides for 28 per cent, and if, therefore, it is the intention of this bill that people who can articles of this character and put them on the market shall put them out in as pure a state as possible under the circumstances, then there is no reason, sir, why my amendment should not prevail.

I submit that it is along the line of the principle which has been advocated by the Senator from Idaho. I hope he will not, when he comes to consider the propostion which I have submitted, oppose the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it is possible that if this were a question of legislation within a State I would not have the slightest objection to the amendment. But it is not in harmony with the scheme of this legislation to fix an arbitrary standard as to any product. In the first place, if it became a part of the pending bill, the amendment would not be in harmony with the law of several States of the Union, which do not require a standard so high as that fixed by the amendment.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. PILES. I find also a statement in this letter to the effect that the Secretary of Agriculture, in a circular published in 1904, defined as a standard for condensed milk, which is the same as condensed or evaporated cream, 28 per cent of milk solids, of which not less than one-quarter shall be milk fat.

It is not, in my mind, a question of State legislation. We are dealing upon the same principle—trying to prevent the adulteration of foods and trying to compel the manufacturer of every article with which this bill deals to put out the very best article than can be manufactured by any concern producing the particular articles dealt with by this bill. If the amendment is one which should commend itself to a State legislature, I do not see why it does not properly belong here.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to make an inquiry of the Senator. Suppose Congress were to fix this standard, and it was not in conformity with the standard of a State in which these articles might be sold. Would it be within the power of Congress to enforce the law after the packages were broken? If not, would it not result in having within the State two standards for goods in common use and common trade? That is the reason why we have all the way through avoided the fixing of standards, because of the varying standards in different States. It is utterly impracticable to fix standards here. I have much sympathy with the Senator's amendment, that the highest standard that can be attained shall be maintained in legislation, but it is impracticable to do it in national legislation, because we can not at all control the standards accepted by the States, and if we should ever invade that field, we would have unending confusion in attempting to adjust the rights of the shipper with the dealer, with the factor. We would be unable to do it.

The Senator calls attention to the fact that this particular brand of evaporated milk and cream has been held or pronounced to be the very best in the United States, as I understand, and he would have every other manufacturer brought up to this high standard. That is desirable, but it is not practical in legislation. Therefore I can not undertake, even when the proper time comes, to accept the amendment, because it is not in harmony with the plan of the proposed legislation.

Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] has offered an amendment, on page 7, lines 12 and 13, which he desires to have considered, and I will yield to him for the purpose of explaining his amendment or making such remarks as he desires to submit.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment which I have offered may be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 9, page 7, line 11, after the words "regarding the," it is proposed to strike out "ingredients or the substances" and to insert "existence or nonexistence or the amount or purity of any ingredient or substance;" so as to make the clause read:

That such drug shall be deemed to be misbranded:

* * * * * * *

Second. If the package containing it, or its label, shall bear any statement regarding the existence or nonexistence or the amount or purity of any ingredient or substance contained therein, which statement shall be false or misleading in any particular, or if the same is falsely branded as to the country, State, or Territory, or place therein, in which it is manufactured or produced, or if the contents of the original package shall have been removed, in whole or in part, and other contents shall have been placed in such package.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask that the letter which I send to the desk be read, and I should be glad if the Senator from Idaho will give it his attention.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

THE NEW WILLARD,
Washington, D. C., February 20, 1906.

Hon. J. A. HEMENWAY,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I sincerely trust that your proposed amendment to Senate bill 88 will meet the approval of the Senate. Every honest man is opposed to the adulteration or false labeling of drugs; but this bill, in the definition of the term "misbranded," as applicable to drugs, goes much beyond that purpose.

Section 9 provides, among other things, that a drug shall be deemed to be misbranded—

"If the package containing it, or its label, shall bear any statement regarding the ingredients or the substances contained therein which statement shall be false or misleading in any particular."

This covers very much more than misbranding or false labeling as commonly understood. Carried to its full length it means that the Federal Government, under the guise of regulating interstate commerce, is to take up and settle by its chemical experts and in the Federal courts a class of questions about which medical men and schools of medicine have been at war for generations. If it is desirable that questions concerning the curative properties of drugs should be settled by process of law, it would seem to be a question for the States rather than for the Federal Government.

The slight change of phraseology proposed by your amendment makes the definition of the term "misbranded" more specific, and excludes the implication that statements made in good faith regarding the therapeutic qualities of medicine or its ingredients can be made the basis for denying the right to transport such drugs from State to State.

Manufacturers have had no opportunity whatever for a hearing upon this or other questions before the honorable committee at the present session of the Senate; but at the hearing before the honorable committee during the second session of the last Congress this question was discussed, and the honorable chairman of the committee, in explaining some of the purposes of the bill, said:

"I have a very good illustration right here in my hand. Here is a bottle marked 'Pepto Mangan.' It says: 'Does not affect the teeth.' There is a statement as to the truth of which the purchaser is entitled to know. This bill provides that if that statement is untrue it shall be a contraband article. What objection is there to it, supposing it does affect the teeth?"

And again:

"We will take Glyco Thymoline. There are a good many things stated upon this package. The purchaser takes the statement to be true. It states what the medicine will do. Suppose that statement is untrue. Then the article becomes contraband under this proposed law. Should it not be so?" (See Senate Report No. 1209, pp. 97 and 98.)

We are bound to assume that the interpretation of the provisions and the purposes of the bill by the honorable chairman of the committee is correct.

I am sure that a determination on the part of the Federal Government to take up and settle questions of this character in connection with interstate commerce would precipitate endless controversies in all parts of the country. Prosecutions would be inaugurated by the Agricultural Department, and as these prosecutions might be based in many cases upon medical questions upon which different men entertain different beliefs it would become a matter of vital importance in some cases as to what school of medicine controlled the Government Department having the subject in charge.

I very earnestly hope that your proposed amendment, or something equivalent, will be adopted, so that no drug shall be deemed to be "misbranded" under this bill by reason of any statement made in good faith relating solely to the medicinal properties of the drug or its ingredients.

Very respectfully, yours,

A. R. BEARDSLEY.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the statement made in the hearings, I think, a year ago:

We will take Glyco Thymoline. There are a good many things stated upon this package. The purchaser takes the statement to be true. It states what the medicine will do. Suppose that statement is untrue. Then the article becomes contraband under this proposed law.

I understand that here is a standard medicine—a medicine used in many families for many years. Suppose some one in a family comes up and says, "Here is a statement that this medicine will do things which it will not do." Who determines the question—the Secretary of Agriculture?

Mr. HEYBURN. The patient.

Mr. HEMENWAY. So one patient will determine that this medicine will not do what it is recommended it will do by the label on the bottle. Then it immediately becomes contraband. Am I right about it? If I am right about it, does the Senator think that is a proper provision to have in the bill, and does he not think my amendment, if it cures the defect, ought to be adopted?

Mr. HEYBURN. The medicine becomes contraband, not because of the quality of the medicine, but because the man has made an untrue statement. It is the label and not the medicine which makes it contraband.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Does the Senator recognize the fact that a medicine which has cured a hundred persons might not cure the hundred and first one? Then, if that person is not cured, and he goes to the Secretary of Agriculture and proves that it did not cure him, that it did not do what it was represented it would do, the article becomes contraband.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. Let the man say "this is a remedy for it" or "it will cure in some cases;" that is all. He can relieve himself of the pains and penalties of the statute by telling the truth about his medicine.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then, in the sale of this medicine, which I suppose hundreds of mothers all over the country have on hand to cure the throat troubles of their children, you would have him say upon the bottle, in place of "this medicine being a cure for these diseases," that "in some cases it will cure."

Mr. HEYBURN. I would say it was a medicine for the purpose of curing these diseases.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why, in a case of this kind, can——

Mr. HEYBURN. I will ask the Senator a question if he will permit me.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. How can any man defend the claimed right of a party to tell an untruth to an unsuspecting public about a medicine sold on the general market, for which there is no possible——

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is exactly what I seek to avoid by my amendment. It reads:

> If the package containing it, or its label, shall bear any statement regarding the existence or nonexistence or the amount or purity of any ingredient or substance contained therein, which statement shall be false—

Then he shall be punished. What objection is there to it?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will say to the Senator there is this objection, that that is a negative to the exclusion of the positive. He need not put any statement on it at all.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Does not that amendment avoid this condition: Here are two good medicines on the market, and their manufacturers are rival concerns. One comes along and says, "Your medicine does not do what you claim it will do." The medicine may be a first-class medicine, just as is the medicine to which I have called the Senator's attention here, but they may find one individual whom the medicine has not affected as it does affect the average individual. You go then to whom? To the Secretary of Agriculture, do you not? Does he try this question?

Mr. HEYBURN. Not at all.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Who does try it?

Mr. HEYBURN. The court, and nobody else.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Then you must go to the court; and that is just what I am seeking to avoid. You would have continuous trials in the courts of the United States.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think one trial would settle it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Why settle it? I put this case right here. Here is a medicine that the Senator must admit is a standard medicine. Then if some one seeking to injure the reputation of this medicine, in order to build up the reputation of his own, should go to court and prove that in one case it did not have the effect it is claimed it ought to have had, would that settle it? Why, no; there would come other trials of numerous people who had tried the medicine with beneficial effect to prove on the other hand that this was a good medicine.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senator has precluded that interpretation or conclusion by the statement that it is a standard medicine. That presupposes that it is that which would be equivalent to a uniform quality; and if a standard medicine, with a standard name, of standard quality was once pronounced illegal, I think that would settle it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. What is a standard medicine? Who fixes the standard?

Mr. HEYBURN. The maker; and if it does not conform to the standard he places on the bottle, then under the provisions of this law it is held to be a misbranding.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Under what rule can any maker of a medicine fix the standard other than to state the truth about it?

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me say to the Senator that this very medicine—Glyco Thymoline—under analysis here has been shown to be of every possible grade of impurity, from the merest imposture and imitation up to the pure article. Innumerable analyses have been made by chemists of this city.

Mr. HEMENWAY. May I be permitted to state that a distinguished physician in the Senate tells me that in his family it has been used for years and is being used now; and the distinguished Senator from Idaho tells me that it is a very bad medicine.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think that is hardly a fair statement. I did not say it was a very bad medicine. I say the analyses which we have had made have disclosed the fact that there is a great deal of fraudulent and bogus medicine under this name upon the market.

Mr. HEMENWAY. No; the Senator did not put it that way. He said this medicine had been analyzed and found to be of all degrees of impurity.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; if the Senator puts it that way, I think that is correct.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I say in return the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], a distinguished physician, advises me that it is being used in his family and has been used for years and is being used now. That can not but result on this bill, unless my amendment goes on, that we shall have constant discussion through the courts as to whether or not the particular remedy will cure the particular disease.

Now, take No. 77, I believe, the sugar pills that we get. They say that they will cure grippe. They will cure grippe in many cases. In other cases they do not cure it. Then in the case where they do not cure it the gentleman goes to the courts and proves that this medicine does not cure grippe and it becomes contraband.

That is a condition of affairs which ought not to be brought about by this bill. When we reach the evil by making them state fairly and honestly and truthfully what their medicine contains—that is, the existence or nonexistence or the amount of purity of any ingredient or substance—and make them state it truthfully, have we not gone far enough without allowing them to go to the courts to determine whether or not a particular medicine will cure a particular disease?

Mr. HEYBURN. This amendment does not require them to state anything affirmatively. It says, "if they state it."

Mr. HEMENWAY. And the Senator's bill does not require it. It says, "if the package containing it, or its label, shall bear any statement regarding the ingredients or the substances." That is the Senator's bill. I follow his language exactly, except that I strike out the words "ingredients or the substances" and add "existence or nonexistence or the amount or purity of any ingredient or substance." I follow the Senator's own language. I see no reason why the amendment I have offered should not be accepted by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator from Idaho will yield to me for just a moment, I am a little inclined to think the Senator from Indiana has not given this language the construction that would be given to it by a court, and therefore that his argument does not apply, at least that is not the construction I myself have given to it. I want read it again:

> If the package containing it, or its label, shall bear any statement regarding the ingredients or the substances contained therein, which statement shall be false or misleading in any particular.

Now, the Senator construes it as though it should read:

> If the package containing it, or its label, shall bear any statement regarding the character or curative qualities of the ingredients or substances.

That would make an entirely different section.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the Senator will permit me, I take the construction placed upon it by the chairman of the committee. I myself can hardly put that construction upon the language, but I take the construction placed upon it by the chairman of the committee in his replies on pages 97 and 98 of the hearings.

Mr. McCUMBER. Sometimes it so happens that when a matter comes up hurriedly before even the chairman of a committee, and somebody has put a certain construction on it, he is liable, possibly, to fall in with that construction and assume that it is right. After all, we have got to get right back to those words and give them a construction, and it does not depend upon what the Senate committee thinks.

I think it is aimed only at the ingredients or substances. In other words, if there is a statement upon the bottle or package that the article contains such and such ingredients, as is often the case, then it shall be deemed to be misbranded or adulterated if it does not contain those ingredients or substances. I was reading a short time ago an analysis made by the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the Senator will yield, I will say that I seek exactly the same result. What I want is that they shall be prosecuted if they fail to state truthfully the ingredients in the bottle or package. But what I seek to avoid is going to the courts to prove the curative powers of certain medicines. The world will never agree as to the curative powers of medicines.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the Senator will find that his amendment goes a great deal further than he intends it should go; that by its negative character it opens wide the gate to all characters of abuses and fraud. That is the main objection to it.

But getting back to the provision, I say my construction is that it is aimed only at the contents. As I was about to state to the Senator before he interrupted me, I have lately read report No. 34, of two years ago, of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, in which they go over a large list of medicines where the bottle or container states that it is composed of such and such drugs, of known curative qualities, when, as a matter of fact, there is not a trace of any such drug in the bottle or in the container. That provision is intended to strike at just such cases as that. I confess myself that if it is not sufficiently clear, I for one am willing to more clearly define its intent.

I take the same letter which the Senator received, and which he was kind enough to hand to me a short time ago, and I call attention to the construction that is placed by the writer of that letter. He says:

> The slight change of phraseology proposed by your amendment makes the definition of the term "misbranded" more specific, and excludes the implication that statements made in good faith regarding the therapeutic qualities of medicine or its ingredients can be made the basis for denying the right to transport such drugs from State to State.

Now, that is not intended, in my opinion, to refer at all to the natural inclination of a manufacturer to blow his goods and to a considerable extent, but he simply shall not state that they contain things which they do not contain. Further on in this letter the writer, I think, falls into an error when he says:

> I have a very good illustration right here in my hand. Here is a bottle marked "Pepto Mangan."

Mr. HEMENWAY. He quotes the language.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand that. It says:

> "Does not affect the teeth." There is a statement as to the truth of which the purchaser is entitled to know. This bill provides that if that statement is untrue it shall be a contraband article. What objection is there to it, supposing it does affect the teeth?

Well, I think there would be serious objection if he makes a false statement even as to its qualities or what effect a certain drug will or will not have. If a person has delicate teeth, and does not want to use something as a tooth wash that will affect them, I do not know that any manufacturer has a right to place upon the bottle a statement that it will not affect the teeth when as a matter of fact it will. But I do not believe that is the intent of the provision in that particular article.

Now, what would be the bad result of the Senator's amendment? He proposes to strike out the words "ingredients or the substances," so that we immediately, by striking out those words, affirmatively give authority to make the false statement with reference to the ingredients or substances, but not with reference to the existence or nonexistence or the amount or purity of any ingredient or substance. In other words, if you strike that out he may say this article contains pepsin, when as a matter of fact it contains no trace of pepsin.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the Senator will permit me, I think he is unwittingly misstating my amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I am, I want to be corrected.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the bill as now drawn without the amendment.

> If the package containing it, or its label, shall bear any statement—

That is not a part of my amendment. It is a part of the original bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That leaves them free to make a statement or not, just as they like. So there can be no construction put upon the amendment I offered other than changing the words "ingredients or the substances" to these words: "Existence or nonexistence or the amount or purity of any ingredient or substance."

I want to say right now I am trying to arrive at the result the Senator seems to be trying to arrive at. I wish to guard in every way the purity of medicines. I wish to put every provision we can put into this bill to guard the people against impure medicines. All I seek to avoid is the right of some one to go to the courts and say because this medicine has not cured in one case, where it might have cured in a hundred others, it shall be contraband and shall not be the subject of interstate commerce. That is what I am trying to avoid, and the only thing I am trying to avoid, by my amendment.

If the Senator, who is much more familiar with this matter than I am and seems to be in harmony with me on the question, can suggest an amendment that is better worded to bring about that result, I would be glad to have him suggest it, because that is the sole thing I seek to accomplish. I want to have the medicine protected in every particular, every safeguard thrown around it to prevent the people from being misled or misinformed by any label or representation upon the bottle or package, but simply to prevent getting into the courts to determine the curative powers of certain medicines.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think I thoroughly understand the position of the Senator from Indiana; but the point I wish to make with him is that I am perfectly willing, so far as I am concerned, to stand upon the simple proposition, and that only, that the manufacturer shall not state that a bottle or package conains a thing which it does not contain, and if he makes any false satement as to the contents, which means "the ingredients or the substances," then it shall be prohibited.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is exactly what I want.

Mr. McCUMBER. But I do not want to go further than that and open up the field and say that he can, however, manufacture this character of goods and simply be prohibited from stating the existence or nonexistence or the amount or purity of any ingredient or substance. I want to leave that just exactly as it is. I do not care how much he blows his own goods provided he does not make a false statement. In other words, I do not want by affirmative legislation to give authority to the manufacturer to falsely blow his goods, and the Senator gives an affirmative authority by this provision.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Will the Senator point out in what particular? Here is a straight provision:

> If the package containing it, or its label, shall bear any statement regarding the existence or nonexistence or the amount of purity of any ingredient or substance contained in any particular—

It is a straight, square provision, that he shall suffer the penalties of this bill if he does in any manner, shape, or form make a false statement.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana will suspend a moment while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 12707) to enable the people of Oklahoma and of the Indian Territory to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States; and to enable the people of New Mexico and of Arizona to form a constitution and State government and be admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask that the unfinished business may be temporarily laid aside that the consideration of the pending bill may be continued.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered. The junior Senator from Indiana will proceed.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I do not see how the Senator can see where this provision changes the bill in the slightest except by taking the construction of the chairman of the committee upon the language of the bill. His construction is that they can go to the courts to determine the curative powers of a medicine.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not want the Senator to state that as my construction.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I am referring to the Senator in charge of the bill. I refer to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN]. That is not the construction, then, of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is not.

Mr. HEMENWAY. May I ask the Senator from Idaho if that is his construction of the bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will ask the Senator to kindly restate his question.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That under the provisions of the bill, if my amendment is not adopted——

Mr. McCUMBER. I assume it is not as sufficiently clear, possibly, as it should be, but I do not think that the quality or character of the ingredients is intended to be affected by a refusal or a neglect to state what the ingredients are.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I ask the Senator from Idaho if he construes the original bill to mean that they can go to the courts and have the court determine the curative powers of these medicines, as to whether or not they will cure headache, as to whether or not they will cure a stomach trouble, and so forth?

Mr. HEYBURN. That question may be too general to be answered as a question involved in the consideration of this bill. The court may determine exactly what the bill delegates to it for determination, and that is whether or not the package containing the drug or its label "shall bear any statement regarding the ingredients or the substances contained therein, which statement shall be false or misleading in any particular." That is what the court may determine.

And it is not a fair test of the construction to be placed upon the language either by the chairman of the committee or by the court to inquire whether the court may determine whether the medicine will cure a headache, because the terms of the bill are "shall bear any statement," not whether it will cure headache or not—

> Shall bear any statement regarding the ingredients or the substances contained therein, which statement shall be false or misleading in any particular.

Now, what constitutes a false or misleading statement is a question for the court to determine, and after it has determined what constitutes such a statement, then it may say upon the testimony, Is the party guilty or not guilty?

Mr. HEMENWAY. The Senator has had long experience and has no doubt given to the bill very careful consideration. It strikes me that after the consideration the Senator has given to it he could be able to construe his own bill and be able to answer a simple question as to whether or not he construes the bill to mean that in the case of, say, No. 77, of the homœpathic medicines, which is advertised to cure grippe, under the provisions of this bill they may go into court and have the courts determine the question as to whether or not No. 77 does cure grippe, on the complaint of some man that it did not cure him.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I do not feel that I can be called upon to go further than the bill goes.

Mr. HEMENWAY. If the Senator will permit me——

Mr. HEYBURN. The argument advanced by the Senator——

Mr. HEMENWAY. Some of us seem to be so unfortunate that we can not understand just what the bill proposes, and we are trying to find out from the Senator who drafted it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; it is the object of this discussion to learn from each other as to the intent and scope and purpose of the bill. So we are within the legitimate purposes of the discussion of this measure.

I fully answer the question of the Senator when I say that the function of the court will be to determine whether there is a statement upon the package or label "regarding the ingredients or the substances contained therein, which statement shall be false or misleading in any particular." That is the function of the court. If it is called upon to deal with this question, necessarily the court must determine that just as it instructs a jury as to what constitutes larceny or murder or any other crime that is being considered. The court instructs the jury as to what constitutes those offenses and then says to the jury: "It is your function now, being instructed as to what constitutes the offense, to determine whether or not under the facts which have been adduced in your presence this party is guilty or not guilty." I see no more difficulty in applying and interpreting this law than in applying any other criminal law. I think that fully answers the Senator's question.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The Senator has not yet answered my direct question as to whether or not the case I state could be determined in the courts. Now, that is all I seek to avoid. I want every protection given to the people that can possibly be given to them against buying something under a false pretense or under a false representation; but I do not want to have a continuous trial in the courts to determine questions that the medical fraternity themselves can not determine. They have been trying for years to determine whether this, that, or the other medicine will cure a certain specific disease, and they have not yet determined it. All I want is to have such legislation as will give the people pure drugs, pure medicines, and protect them against being misinformed and misled by statements printed upon a bottle or box or from being misled in any other way by men who have medicines to sell; but I certainly do not want to have the people of the country put into the courts to determine the differences between the opinions of physicians all over the country as to whether or not this or that medicine has certain curative powers.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would be glad to have the Senator's opinion as to what question the courts would determine, under the language of this bill, in his judgment. He is a lawyer of long experience, and I should like to know.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Judging from the construction put upon it by the Senator——

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to have the Senator's judgment and not a deduction drawn from the judgment of another.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Candidly I will say to the Senator that I do not believe, under the bill as drawn by the Senator, the courts could determine the curative power of medicines; and the only reason for my amendment is because the Senator, who is a lawyer of distinction and whose ability is well known not only in the Senate, but all over the United States, has put a different construction upon the language of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will ask the Senator where I have placed a different construction upon the bill?

Mr. HEMENWAY. In the hearings.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to have a reference.

Mr. HEMENWAY. On pages 97 and 98 of the hearings.

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to see just what precedes it.

Mr. HEMENWAY. Unless I misconstrue the language of the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, if the Senator from Indiana wishes to make the bill absolutely certain to have his construction, it could be done by striking out the word "regarding" and inserting the words "as to its constituent;" so as to read:

If the package containing it, or its label, shall bear any statement as to its constituent ingredients or the substances contained therein.

That change can be made if there is any question about it. I will frankly say that that has been the construction I have placed upon it, and I never thought of it in any other light. The Senator from Indiana agrees with me.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I think the Senator has worded it better than I have done.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I simply rose to suggest that I think the Senator from North Dakota has solved the difficulty we have been struggling with. The Senator from Indiana, sotto voce, consulted me as to the two remedies mentioned in the testimony—Pepto Mangan and Glyco Thymoline. I said to the Senator that I knew nothing about Pepto Mangan, but I presumed there was some iron in it, because it says on the label it will not affect the teeth injuriously.

It is pretty difficult to know whether a remedy will cure or kill. If doctors were required to do what the Senator from Idaho suggested these remedies ought to be required to do, the medical profession would have a hard time of it. Patients have idiosyncrasies. One man can take a dose of strychnine in a very large quantity, while the thousandth part of a grain of strychnine would throw another man in convulsions. I have known just such cases. So we can not hold physicians up to the standard of always knowing what a remedy will do when it is administered.

So in reference to one of these advertised remedies. It might not affect the teeth in a thousand persons, and it might injuriously affect the teeth in another person who has a peculiar idiosyncrasy or whose teeth were composed of somewhat different materials from what they ought to be.

As to Glyco Thymoline, it is a remedy that is used in families for sore throats and that class of cases, and I have never heard it called in question as being made of impure material. It may be that there are some fraudulent imitations of it on the market.

The Senator was unfortunate. This controversy arose from what I think was an ill-considered observation on the part of the Senator from Idaho during the hearing, in which he said, as to Pepto Mangan, if it says it would not affect the teeth, and if it did affect the teeth it would be contraband—that is, if it affected the teeth of one person it might be ruled out as an article of commerce. So with Glyco Thymoline, the Senator suggested that if the statement on the package or the bottle was not found to be true—he did not say by whom, presumably by one person——

Mr. HEYBURN. No; by the courts.

Mr. GALLINGER. That would likewise be contraband. The Senator, I think, in those suggestions went a little beyond what he intended. I think the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Indiana are aiming at precisely the same thing. I feel sure that the suggested amendment on the part of the Senator from North Dakota will cure the entire difficulty, and I hope the Senator from Idaho will accept it, and we shall get through with this discussion.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should not like, Mr. President, to indicate what occurred before the committee. We differ, of course, as to our conclusions very often as to what should and what should not be incorporated in the law. I perhaps go further—doubtless I do—than the Senator from New Hampshire in regard to what the law should provide and what protection should be thrown about the people. I do not believe that any medicine that professes to be free from injurious properties to any organ of the body should be sold under an advertisement that it is free from such injurious effects unless it is really so. The Senator from New Hampshire makes more allowance for the differences of physical conditions and circumstances than I do. I think that it is a question merely as to what interpretation I would put upon the law or what interpretation the Senator from New Hampshire or the Senator from Indiana would put upon the law. Were I sitting as a judge in this case I would perhaps hold these people to a stricter rule of responsibility and accountability than would the Senator from New Hampshire or the Senator from Indiana.

The suggested solution of interpolating the word "constituent" before the word "ingredient" is an innocent and harmless one. "Ingredient" and "constituent elements" are synonymous terms; they mean one and the same thing, and I should have no objection to using the word twice or in two sentences. I assume if the word "constituent" is interpolated before the word "ingredient" that the Senator from Indiana would withdraw the balance of his amendment. I certainly would not object to it, because if the word "ingredient" is a strong word, then "constituent ingredient" is a stronger term.

Mr. HEMENWAY. I withdraw my amendment if the insertion of that word cures what I am trying to cure, as I understand the Senator from Idaho to think I have misconstrued his statement in the hearings. My own construction of this language would not allow the court to determine the curative powers of a medicine; but certainly now, and not in the court, this question ought to be determined. We have too much legislation that is uncertain and misleading, and where the courts are compelled to determine what Congress intended. In legislating we ought so to legislate that there would be no trouble in determining what Congress intended. That is what I am driving at now—to secure such legislation here as to leave the question not in doubt as to whether or not the courts can determine as to the curative powers of medicines. I want them to have full power to determine as to the purity and as to the fact whether or not any article is misrepresented by the label on a bottle or a representation of the ingredients, etc. I think the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota covers the point.

Mr. HEYBURN. That embodies withdrawing the balance of your amendment?

Mr. HEMENWAY. I withdraw it temporarily. I am going to look into the matter, however, and if I make up my mind that it does not cure the evil, I shall of course reserve the right to urge my amendment hereafter.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] will be stated at the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 11, after the word "statement," it is proposed to strike out "regarding the," and to insert "as to its constituent;" so that if amended the clause will read:

Second. If the package containing it, or its label, shall bear any statement as to its constituent ingredients or the substances contained therein.

Mr. HEMENWAY. That is right.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have no right to accept the amendment at this time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be ordered to be printed and will lie upon the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask to take up three or four amendments which I offered yesterday, which are identical, except that they appear in different portions of the bill. On page 4, line 19, I think the first occurs.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first amendment proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In section 4, page 4, line 19, after the word "substance," it is proposed to insert "in sufficient quantity to be;" and in line 24, before the word "injurious," to insert "in sufficient quantity to be;" so that if amended it will read:

SEC. 4. That the examinations of specimens of foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors shall be made in the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture, or under the direction and supervision of such Bureau, for the purpose of determining from such examinations whether such article is adulterated or misbranded, or contains any poisonous or other substance in sufficient quantity to be deleterious to the health of human beings or domestic animals; and if it shall appear from any such examination that such specimens are adulterated or misbranded or contain any added poisonous or deleterious substance or ingredient in sufficient quantity to be injurious to human health when used in the prescribed or usual manner of use of such article, etc.

Mr. GALLINGER. I trust the Senator from Idaho will observe what I have to say. I will occupy but a few moments. I hope, after I have presented my views very briefly, the Senator will accept this amendment.

The question of what is deleterious to human health is a very broad one. We will take, as an illustration, the matter that was up for discussion yesterday—Lea & Perrin's Worcestershire sauce—in which there was found salicylic acid. It is not stated how much salicylic acid was found in it, though it presumably was an infinitesimal quantity, so far as the amount that is usually consumed at table is concerned. Salicylic acid and boracic acid as well are drugs which are used in medicine. The usual dose of both of those acids is 7½ grains—500 milligrams. That is not either the minimum nor the maximum dose, but it is the usual dose. Physicians are in the habit of giving 15 grains of salicylic acid in the treatment of rheumatism, and, a patient taking it day after day for a considerable length of time, no harm is presumed to come from it. Fifteen grains of salicylic acid would probably be as much as would be put into a gallon, more or less, we will say, of Lea & Perrin's Worcestershire sauce; and half the teaspoonful, more or less, that is consumed at table as an addition to the fish, certainly could do no harm to the human system; but if this bill remains in its present form any amount of salicylic acid or boracic acid, or any similar drug, found in a food supply would make it contraband and bring it under the ban of the law. So it seems to me there can be no harm in inserting the words "in sufficient quantity to be" before the words "deleterious to health." That is a matter that can be determined by the scientists who will have charge of the administration of this bill should it become a law, and they will have some leeway in the determination of the matters that will come to their attention. I will ask the Senator if he does not think this is a very proper amendment?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to have the benefit of a suggestion from the Senator from New Hampshire. In his judgment would this apply to preservatives injected into meat?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think not.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have been studying the language of the bill for the purpose of determining just how far the scope of the amendment would go.

Mr. GALLINGER. The provision is:

SEC. 4. That the examinations of specimens of foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors shall be made in the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture, or under the direction and supervision of such Bureau, for the purpose of determining from such examinations whether such article is adulterated or misbranded, or contains any poisonous or other substance in sufficient quantity to be deleterious to the health of human beings or domestic animals, etc.

Mr. HEYBURN. "Article" relates to all classes of food, and it would be a question of how much boracic acid might be injected into meat for preservative purposes or how much formaldehyde or any of those substances, embalming fluids—and it was a very active question during the late Spanish war as to whether or not embalming fluid that had been injected into meat was in sufficient quantity to affect the human stomach and destroy the digestive powers. If this were confined to poisons, as used in drugs, I should feel differently about it; but it is a question in my mind as to how far this proposed amendment would go. I do not know whether the Senator from New Hampshire has considered it in all its possible phases or not. For instance, we demonstrated recently here in the case of hams that the modern process of curing ham consisted in injecting with a syringe boracic acid once into the bone and once into the very heart of the meat of the ham for the purpose of preserving it. Of course that acid could not be removed, and it would be very difficult for us to determine just what quantity was in the ham.

Mr. GALLINGER. I quite agree with the Senator on that point, but, per contra, under the terms of the bill, if an infinitesimal quantity of boracic acid is found, it immediately places the article under the ban of the law. There may be a little difficulty, perhaps, in the line suggested by the Senator, but I think it would be much less than it would be under the terms of the bill. I feel sure that we do not mean to legislate so as to make a man who uses in the preparation of any article of food a quantity of drug so small that it has no appreciable effect on the human system amenable to the law and that his goods shall be placed under the ban and denied the privilege of interstate commerce. I do not think there will be the least earthly difficulty in the matter if the bill is amended as I suggest.

Of course the scientists who will have charge, in the first place, of the administration of this proposed law and in determining these questions will be fully competent to determine whether or not the quantity of adulterant, if it may be so called, is sufficient to do any harm. On the other hand, if they are not given the privilege of so determining the question, they will be held to a determination adverse to the manufacture of the goods if the least possible portion is found in the goods. Is not that correct?

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to call his attention to the limitation placed upon this very provision, commencing on line 25, at the bottom of page 4. The limitation was intended to cure or meet the objection of the Senator from New Hampshire without throwing the door wide open to the use of such quantity as might in the judgment of the packer be safe. The limitation is contained in these words:

And if it shall appear from any such examination that such specimens are adulterated or misbranded or contain any added poisonous or deleterious substance or ingredient in sufficient quantity to be injurious to human health when used in the prescribed or usual manner of use of such article.

Those are the words of limitation, and I felt at the time that it was as far as we ought to go without chancing the throwing open of the door to just such conditions as exist in reference to the method of preserving meat in warm weather by those very drastic and radical processes that were generally condemned throughout the country.

If we say "in sufficient quantity to be deleterious to the health of human beings," then it will leave it to the packer primarily to determine; and I do not think it will protect him at all. I think the words of limitation to which I have called the attention of the Senator are perhaps safer for both parties and will effectuate the purpose to be accomplished; but there is some danger in the amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire. There would not be, however, if it were confined to drugs.

Mr. GALLINGER. No.

Mr. HEYBURN. There would be no danger if confined to drugs, but confined to preservatives used in the embalming processes of meats there is no little danger. I do not like that provision.

Mr. GALLINGER. I do not quite understand the phraseology of the bill which the Senator quoted:

And if it shall appear from any such examination that such specimens—

That is, drugs, medicines, liquors, or foods—

are adulterated or misbranded or contain any added poisonous or deleterious substance or ingredient injurious to human health when used in the prescribed or usual manner of use of such article.

Does the Senator mean used medicinally?

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, of course, that limitation applies not only to medicines and drugs, but it applies also to articles of food.

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. So the use would be determined by the character of the article.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator is aware, as I suggested a moment ago, that medicinally 15 grains of salicylic acid is frequently administered and no special harm comes. This provision says "injurious to human health when used in the prescribed or usual manner of use of such articles." Does the Senator mean in the medicinal quantity—that a man can take an article of food and eat it at a meal if it does not contain more than 15 grains of salicylic acid?

Mr. HEYBURN. I would suggest to the Senator that to obviate the objection which I see in it, can not the amendment be limited to drugs?

Mr. GALLINGER. I think so. I think that would be very wise.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then it would be clear of controversy.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator take that into prayerful consideration?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; and if the Senator between now and the time the amendment comes up will just incorporate a limitation there making it apply only to drugs, I shall have no objection to it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Very well.

Mr. SPOONER. Has the Senator from Idaho amended in any wise the proviso in the fourth subdivision, on page 8, concerning which we had some discussion on a former day?

Mr. HEYBURN. Is that the Lodge amendment?

Mr. SPOONER. No; I called the Senator's attention to the proviso which was in the bill then, and is in the bill now, in the fourth subdivision on page 8. It is as follows:

Fourth. If it contain any added poisonous or other ingredient which may render such article injurious to human health: Provided, That goods intended for export shall not be deemed misbranded or adulterated when prepared and packed in accordance with specifications of the foreign purchaser, provided no substance is used that is in conflict with the laws of the country to which the goods are to be shipped, when such country having laws upon the subject does not prohibit such process of preparation.

Does that stand as it stood originally?

Mr. HEYBURN. That stands as it is in the bill now.

Mr. SPOONER. That relates to what is known as packing in bond?

Mr. HEYBURN. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. SPOONER. That is not what it says.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is what it amounts to. The terms of the provision limit it to packing in bond. Of course there is no such legal designation to be applied to packing, but I am using the synonymous term. That class of packing is confined to goods that under the law go into the market, except under laws in conformity with the processes under which the goods are prepared. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, the Senator exhibits some heat——

Mr. HEYBURN. I think not.

Mr. SPOONER. Which I think, if I occasioned it, I ought perhaps to apologize to him for, but this is a bill of the utmost importance. If passed, and it probably will be, it will be felt directly and indirectly in every community in the United States. Although that is left for the court to decide, it is the first substantial attempt, in my judgment, to turn the commerce power of the Constitution into a police power like unto that which belongs to a State; but I do not care to go into that question now. I think the Senator will admit with all the penalties and the limitation the bill ought to be as free from possibility of misconstruction as the utmost labor and thought can make it.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator what change, if any, he would make in that provision?

Mr. SPOONER. I think the provision is a bad one as it reads. There is nothing in it which limits its operation to articles in bond. There is nothing in it, Mr. President, which limits the scope of the provision to mere packing or to preparation for export. If it is to be taken, as it seems to me is its necessary construction, as an authority conferred by the statute to export for the benefit of the packers or any other exporters, to be used as food in foreign countries, articles which, because they are deleterious and dangerous to the human system, we prohibit among our own people, its tendency will be to degrade our commerce, to cover it with suspicion, and the United States will thereby have fallen from a commercial standard, very much higher, as shown by our previous legislation, than it will be after the enactment of this legislation.

Mr. McCUMBER. I assume that the Senator understands the object——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I assume that the Senator understands the object of this provision.

Mr. SPOONER. The object of it was explained the other day, but the language of the provision goes beyond the object as stated the other day.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think, Mr. President, if the language does go beyond the object, of course we can limit it to that object.

Mr. SPOONER. That was the object of the discussion the other day.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to say again, so that we may thoroughly understand each other and may perfect it according to what the Senator thinks is just and proper, that the provision is one that was asked to be inserted by the representative of the packing industries.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. There was a question whether, under this bill, because it does not declare one way or the other, it might possibly be construed that packing meat in borax would injure it. The packers did not wish to be interfered with in transporting meat to a foreign country where the order directed from the foreign country stipulated that the meat should packed in borax in crossing the sea. I have here before me, if the Senator will excuse me just one moment, the "Confirmation of forward sales" for the Liverpool market. They are the originals, and in every instance the order is for so many ribs, and so forth, "packed in borax." They claim that it is almost necessary for it to be so packed because of the dampness in crossing the ocean. Where the order itself from the foreign country requests that meat be so packed and there is nothing in the laws of the foreign country which prohibits its being received in that form, then the packers should have the right to comply with the order in the foreign country. I shall certainly be very glad to limit it to just those cases of necessity.

Mr. SPOONER. That is in the Senator's mind——

Mr. McCUMBER. I say I would be glad to limit it to those cases.

Mr. SPOONER. But it is not in the section. There is a blending here of adulteration and misbranding and preparation for shipment. The word "packed" is not significant there, for the reason that it is used in the first subdivision on page 8, which reads:

In the case of food an article shall be deemed to be adulterated—

First. If any substance or substances has or have been mixed and packed with it so as to reduce or lower or injuriously affect its quality or strength.

The word "packed" would be construed by the court to have been used in both these cases in the same sense, and in the first subdivision, to which I have just called attention, it is not used in any connection with preparations for export. It is used as a constituent element of adulteration.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. In the fourth section it is specifically used in connection with the word "prepared." "Prepared and packed"—that is the phrase.

Mr. SPOONER. "Packed" is one thing. What does "prepared" mean? What does the preparation of a drug mean? The word "prepared" is not a word of technical signification. Applied to food, what does it mean—"prepared food?"

Provided, That goods intended for export shall not be deemed misbranded or adulterated when prepared and packed in accordance with specifications of the foreign purchaser.

"Prepared and packed." There you draw the distinction between the preparation and the packing. You propose to pack in borax.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; if the Senator will excuse me, that is not wholly the case. The meat, as it was stated before the committee, is not only packed in borax—that is, having borax around it—but the borax is rubbed in to some extent; and it is prepared by having a solution of the borax poured over the whole ham, or ribs, or whatever it is to be exported. It was thought that the word "packed" itself, which means simply putting the article into a box, would not be broad enough to cover this preparation to preserve it. If we can get some other word that would be just as well, I should have no objection.

Mr. SPOONER. Dealers in my own city were convicted last summer for the sale of meats in which had been used borax and some other things of that kind employed in preserving. All I want is this: I should like to have this language made so clear that when this bill shall have passed there can not be predicated upon it the imputation that the Congress of the United States has deliberately authorized the export of food products for sale among the unsuspecting people of other lands which we will not permit to be shipped from State to State or sold to the people of our own land. That provision of the bill would not read well abroad if the construction that I put upon it—and I am not seeking a strained construction or a sinister one—should be upheld. It is inconsistent with much legislation of Congress—the filled-cheese legislation, and the legislation as to the inspection on this side of meats and dairy products, as I recollect, which legislation was intended to commend the exports of the United States to foreign countries. Those laws have been quite efficient, as the consular reports show. I am simply contending that nothing shall be in this bill—and I know of nothing but this clause—which can be construed as an intention to lower our commercial standard in foreign commerce. I think the Senator from North Dakota can phrase that provision so as to accomplish every legitimate purpose of the packers, if there be any, and as to that I do not undertake to say.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me ask the Senator right here if this modification would suit his views? The present provision is this:

Provided, That goods intended for export shall not be deemed misbranded or adulterated when prepared and packed in accordance with specifications of the foreign purchaser, etc.

Change it so that it will read:

Provided, That goods intended for export shall not be deemed misbranded or adulterated when the preparation and packing for shipment shall be in accordance with specifications of the foreign purchaser, etc.

So that it will clearly indicate that the word "preparation" means simply the preparing of the article for shipment and not the making of it.

Mr. SPOONER. Then it really leaves the foreign users of it entirely subject to the greed of the merchant who orders it for their use.

I should like to have it made clearer, if it can be made clearer, that the article that is shipped shall not be a prohibited article in our own country. Now, that would defeat the object of this amendment, or would it not?

Mr. McCUMBER. We do not determine in this bill whether the use of borax will or will not——

Mr. SPOONER. This does not say anything about borax.

Mr. McCUMBER. Or any of those ingredients——

Mr. SPOONER. Borax is only one of numerous chemicals, if I may use that word—preservatives.

Mr. McCUMBER. It will depend upon whether or not the court shall construe that certain ingredients do affect injuriously.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not see any provision for a court under this clause.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SPOONER. I yield to both Senators.

Mr. HEYBURN. This provision was reported under the directions of the committee. I would perhaps not be considered as failing in my duty to the committee if I were to say that I have no sympathy with it. But it is the committee's report. I believed then, and I feel free to say so now, that the standard of our products for export should be up to the standard of our products for home consumption.

Mr. SPOONER. That is right; that is honest.

Mr. HEYBURN. But I am here to represent the committee in this bill, and they have instructed me to report the bill; and I hope the Senator will not again fall into the error of thinking that because I may be somewhat earnest in my manner of speaking I am displaying any temper.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not quite intend that.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator suggested it. I am not always conscious of my manner of speaking.

Mr. SPOONER. The manner is always satisfactory to me.

Mr. HEYBURN. But while I think the standard of our exports should be up to the standard of our products for home consumption, I will say that the committee have reported this measure, and in the wisdom of the committee this measure is worthy the consideration of this body, and I am here to give the best reasons the committee had to give for retaining the provision in the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I very much prefer the reasons which the Senator gives for putting it out of the bill than I do the reasons of the committee for putting it in the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. If I may be permitted to finish my observation——

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. No Senator has offered any amendment providing for the elimination of this provision from the bill. It was before Congress at the last session; it has been here for many years; and it is not becoming that I should offer an amendment eliminating it. The Senator from Wisconsin confines himself to a criticism of it, but has not proposed that it be eliminated from the bill.

Mr. SPOONER. I have heard that observation before. I am not on that committee. I sit here, and when bills come up and are presented to the Senate, I look them over as thoroughly as I can. No Senator can read all the bills upon which this body acts, not even all the important bills. If I see something, as I read a bill, which I think ought to be changed or is liable to misconstruction, I conceive it or have conceived it to be my duty to call the attention of the Senate to it in the expectation that if there be force in the objection I make the committee which prepared the bill and whose duty it is to have become perfectly familiar with the subject would prepare a proper amendment, if I can not at the moment.

Last year I performed this same function, which is an ungracious one, as to the pure-food bill, in connection with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. Platt], who is greatly missed from this Chamber. No one whose opinion is worth consideration could suppose for one moment that either of us could be seeking merely to obstruct good legislation. And I recollect that almost every amendment suggested by the Senator from Connecticut, and nearly every one to which I called the attention of Senators having the bill in charge, were acquiesced in, and the bill was amended accordingly. The bill was very much improved, and the discussion last year, which did not operate to kill the bill, has, I think my friend the Senator from Idaho will admit, enabled the committee to improve very much this bill over the bill of last year.

Mr. President, I am not at this moment able to draw an amendment which will accomplish what the packers want to accomplish and accomplish what the Senator himself thinks is the dignified, honorable commercial attitude for the Government of the United States to take. If we are to permit, by our statute, shipment abroad of food products for use across the sea which by the same statute we prohibit in our own country, that ends it. No amendment to the proviso will cure it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Suppose the Senate strikes out the paragraph?

Mr. SPOONER. It may be that with the peculiar knowledge which the Senator ought to have, and which his colleague from North Dakota ought to have—and I have thought perhaps did have—with fuller information on this subject, they might devise some amendment to the amendment which would accomplish in part and in a proper way the object of this proviso. If that can not be done, then it ought to be stricken out, and I rose really to ask the Senator whether it had not been amended. I supposed it had been.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am free to say that it does not occur to me that the proviso could be amended at all and retain any element of the purpose for which it was incorporated in the bill. If a different rule for the preparation of meats for export is to be provided for in this bill, that provides for it as effectually and as well as any other language could provide for it. It is only a question as to the wisdom of recognizing a different standard for that class of merchandise. I do not feel like undertaking to improve upon the construction of that language for the accomplishment of that purpose. There is the choice between the two propositions—either adopt it, if it be thought wise and proper that we should recognize the standard abroad in preparing food for foreign shipment; adopt the language as it is, or else make no exception in the rule as to the preparation of our foods.

Mr. SPOONER. I think the Senator is right. That can be reached by a motion.

I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota or the Senator from Idaho kindly to turn to page 7, the nineteenth line:

In the case of food an article shall be deemed to be adulterated:
First. If any substance or substances has or have been mixed and packed with it so as to reduce or lower or injuriously affect its quality or strength.

I do not care for that.

Second. If any substance or substances has or have been substituted wholly or in part for the article.

Mr. McCUMBER. From what page of the bill is the Senator from Wisconsin reading?

Mr. SPOONER. Page 7.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of the old print? He is not reading from the new print.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The provision appears at the top of page 8 of the new print.

Mr. SPOONER. It is on the page before the proviso, which we have been discussing, is found. You can locate it by that proviso.

Mr. HEYBURN. Page 7?

Mr. GALLINGER. It is page 8 of the new print.

Mr. SPOONER. It is page 7 of my print.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is the second subdivision to which the Senator refers?

Mr. SPOONER. The second:

Second. If any substance or substances has or have been substituted wholly or in part for the article.

Is that satisfactory to the Senator? Does it make no difference whether it improves it or is detrimental to it?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly not, whether it improves it or is detrimental. Let us take a case of this kind.

Mr. SPOONER. This is not misbranding; this is adulteration.

Mr. McCUMBER. This is adulteration. Let me give a case. The Senator goes to a store and purchases strained honey. One-half of that honey is glucose. It may be that the glucose is better than the honey. It may add to it. It may be wholly glucose, with what is called "honey flavoring." If the glucose is substituted wholly or in part for the honey, it would be deemed to be adulterated. So I can say of maple sirup or any other kind of sirup. That is the object of the provision.

Mr. SPOONER. Or if corn meal is substituted in part for wheat in flour?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. That is an adulteration within the meaning of the bill?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; where it operates as a fraud.

Mr. SPOONER. As a fraud—only that?

Mr. McCUMBER. As a fraud. Ordinarily people do not adulterate for the purpose of putting in a better article. Generally it is a cheaper article that is substituted.

Mr. SPOONER. Take the next provision.

Third. If any valuable constituent of the article has been wholly or in part abstracted.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let us take nutmegs as an example. You will find, if you go down to one of the stores in the city and wish to buy nutmegs, that there are two kinds. One will be of ash-brown color, and the other kind will be covered with little white spots, showing the use of lime. If you put the latter under the magnifying glass, you will find there are little punctures in it, and you will find also that the nutmeg oil has all been extracted from the nutmeg before it is sold. I give you that simply as one example. The same is true as to many spices.

Mr. SPOONER. Take the abstraction of caffeine from coffee——

Mr. McCUMBER. I presume so.

Mr. SPOONER. A coffee extract; would that be an adulteration?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly; because it changes the quality and character of the particular goods.

Mr. SPOONER. Wherein does the fraud consist—in the misbranding or adulteration?

Mr. McCUMBER. The fraud in this case would be in adulteration. We state what is misbranding—where you give a name to an article different from its real name. We differentiate between adulteration and misbranding. Adulterations are intended to cover those cases where you change the quality of the particular thing by additions, etc., and misbranding is where you give to a food article a name entirely different from its own.

Mr. SPOONER. Suppose you extract the cream from milk before concentrating it, and sell it for milk——

Mr. McCUMBER. That is an adulteration.

Mr. SPOONER. Is that an adulteration?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly it would be an adulteration. While it would still be milk, it would not have all the milk, or all the qualities of milk. Whereas if you simply took chalk and water and sold it for milk——

Mr. SPOONER. That would be a fraud.

Mr. McCUMBER. That would be a fraud.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is substituting a cheaper article.

Mr. SPOONER. It might not be cheaper, and for some purposes might be more useful and healthful.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think there is much danger of a person buying a more expensive article and adding it to a cheaper article for the purpose of selling it.

Mr. SPOONER. I have known instances where an article more healthful than the original article was produced by the abstraction of certain constituents.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can give the Senator another case. There is advertised in our drug stores phenacetin. The price of phenacetin is about $1 per ounce. In an examination made a short time ago in the drug stores of New York, out of 343 samples, or something like that, over 315 were adulterated with acetanilid. Some of them were wholly acetanilid, some two-thirds, and so on. Acetanilid costs about 25 cents a pound, while phenacetin costs a dollar an ounce. So you see by the substitution the druggist would make 6,400 per cent.

Mr. SPOONER. Undoubtedly——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair calls the attention of Senators to the fact that according to the unanimous-consent agreement made yesterday, the hour of 3 o'clock having arrived, the debate will henceforth proceed under the ten-minute rule.

Mr. SPOONER. Undoubtedly there are a vast number of adulterations, but my fear is that the definitions here might, and almost inevitably would, lead to the statutory characterization of certain things, which really are healthful and for some purposes an improvement, as adulterations. It ought not to be so. I do not know—this matter is so complex and bewildering—whether definitions can be made that will not do that.

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not think so, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. If it is necessary formally, I move to strike out section 4. I do it for the purpose of asking some questions about this section:

That the examinations of specimens of foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors shall be made in the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture.

As I understand, that is the place where all the analyses provided for in this bill are to be made—in the Agricultural Department—that is, analyses of foods, of drugs, of medicines, and of liquors. Of course we have a laboratory in this city, erected at very large expense, not in charge simply of chemists, but in charge of physicians as well, whose function it is, in its relation to the public health, to analyze drugs.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope the Senator is not assuming that this method of examination by the Secretary of Agriculture or through the Bureau of Chemistry is the only method by which you can get one of these cases into court.

Mr. SPOONER. No; I am not——

Mr. McCUMBER. You can take the report of any chemist and present it to the district attorney.

Mr. SPOONER. It is not that. I am only calling attention, as I go along, to the fact that there is already a bureau of the Treasury Department charged with the duty of analyzing drugs for the purpose of ascertaining whether they are in accord with the pharmacopœia and all that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Also in the Agriculture Department.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; but the Agriculture Department deals with it only from the standpoint of the chemist, while the Public Health Department of the United States deals with it from the standpoint of the chemist and the standpoint of the pathologist.

Mr. GALLINGER. Physiologist.

Mr. SPOONER. Physiologist.

Mr. GALLINGER. Which is very important.

Mr. SPOONER. First my thought is this: When there has been established by law a Health Department of the United States, and this well-organized laboratory, which is engaged constantly in this very work of analyzing drugs in their relation to the public health for the purpose of ascertaining just what is provided here, why duplicate this work? Why add to the Agriculture Department the function of analyzing drugs?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. McCUMBER. I can answer the Senator if he wishes me to answer him now. I understand this is a sort of running debate. No one is taking advantage of the ten-minute limit at all.

Mr. SPOONER. All right. I would be glad to know.

Mr. McCUMBER. I understand there are something over a hundred chemists in the Agricultural Department. Those chemists are scattered all over the country. They are not alone in the city of Washington. They are performing their duties for the Agricultural Department. In the other Bureau to which this is to be referred, according to the amendment, are two chemists and two assistants. This bill fixes the only standard that it is necessary to fix—that is, it determines what shall be considered adulterated and what shall be considered misbranded.

The chemist, therefore, whether he is from the Agricultural Department or wherever he may be from, does not pass upon the physiological effect of this drug or that drug or this food or that food. He simply passes upon the question whether or not this drug or this food measures up to the standard which the bill provides; that is, the definition. In the case of drugs, that they shall conform to the standard provided in the Pharmacopœia or National Formulary. In the case of foods, simply that they shall not be misbranded, or they shall not be adulterated under these definitions. And if there is any other department, I will frankly say to the Senator, which he can convince us could more properly take charge of this matter, I can see no reason why it could not be changed to that other department.

We have assumed that the Agricultural Department, because of its duty of examining foods under an appropriation which we make every year, and with its more than 100 chemists in the field, was better qualified to take up that subject without additional expense than any other Department. If the Senator can show that I am in error, all right.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator, in my mind, shows by his own statement that he is in error. What is the object of the analysis of drugs? First, it is to determine adulterations. A man may adulterate a food or drugs or liquors in a manner not detrimental to the health of those who use them. In that event, he is simply stealing money from them. He is pretending to sell them something which he does not deliver. He is a common cheat and a fraud. But he is respectable, although a scoundrel, compared with the man who, for dollars, sells something which will steal away the health, the vitality, the strength of men, women, and children. Mr. President, the law in its punishment should make a distinction between the two—a mere fine or a short term of imprisonment for the fraud, but a long term of imprisonment alone for the man who couples with his fraud assassination or attempted assassination.

This very section shows that the hundred chemists—and there will be how many after this bill has passed? A thousand at least, I venture to say—scattered throughout the country are not the men one would think capable of determining whether drugs and medicines are adulterated or misbranded—that they might determine, perhaps—or whether they contain any poisonous or other substance deleterious to the health of human beings.

Mr. McCUMBER. That pertains to food, not drugs.

Mr. SPOONER. Let us see.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does it not?

Mr. SPOONER. Let us see whether it does or not.

SEC. 4. That the examinations of specimens of foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors shall be made in the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture, or under the direction and supervision of such Bureau, for the purpose of determining from such examinations whether such article is adulterated or misbranded—

That means either a food, a drug, a medicine, or a liquor—or—

The section draws a distinction. It may be adulterated and it may be misbranded, and yet be not detrimental to the public health, for it says:

or contains any poisonous or other substance deleterious to the health of human beings or domestic animals.

Men every day take poison to bring back health, to cure disease, but whether that poison is detrimental to the human body and to health or is its salvation is something not determinable by the chemist. It is determinable by men who have followed the honorable and useful profession of the Senator from New Hampshire.

I suppose it will be said that I am attempting to kill this pure-food bill, when I am trying to call the attention of the Senate and of Senators having the bill in charge to this defect, in connection with the assertion that we already have by law this chemical laboratory for the purpose, first, of ascertaining whether a drug is or is not adulterated; if adulterated in what the adulteration consists, and to have those investigations made by physiologists, capable of determining the effect of the adulterant upon the human system.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Wisconsin has expired under the rule.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest, in response to the Senator's criticism, that the function of the officer, the examiner, is merely to determine a fact. He takes no action whatever after that determination upon the determination. He merely determines the fact.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is mistaken about his own bill. Of course my time is up.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is a question of interpretation. I have the bill before me, and it is couched in reasonably plain language.

The examinations * * * shall be made—

I go directly to the subject—

* * * for the purpose of determining from such examinations whether such article is adulterated or misbranded—

Those are facts—

or contains any poisonous or other substance—

Those are facts—

deleterious to the health of human beings or domestic animals.

That is a fact.

Mr. SPOONER. It is an opinion, is it not?

Mr. HEYBURN. But it is not an opinion which goes further than the expression of itself. No action is taken upon the opinion.

Mr. SPOONER. Let us see if that is true.

Mr. HEYBURN. The determination of a fact is merely an opinion.

Mr. SPOONER. Let us see if that is true. If the Senator will permit me to speak in his time, I suppose the question whether a drug contains a poison detrimental to human health or deleterious is a matter of opinion. It depends somewhat upon the quantity, I presume.

Mr. GALLINGER. And upon the individual.

Mr. SPOONER. And upon the individual, and upon a variety of circumstances and facts which the chemist would not naturally know. But the Senator says that no action is taken upon it. There is action taken upon it.

And if it shall appear from any such examination that such specimens are adulterated or misbranded or contain any added poisonous or deleterious substance or ingredient injurious to human health—

That is all for this chemist to determine—when used in the prescribed or usual manner of use of such article—

Then what follows—

the Secretary of Agriculture shall cause notice thereof to be given to the parties from whom such samples were obtained, and public notice of the facts shall be given by publication in such manner as the rules and regulations may prescribe to all other persons, association of persons, or corporations in whose possession like articles may be found or known to be that such article is within the provision of this act.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will ask leave to interrupt the Senator right there to call his attention to the fact that a committee amendment is on the table and at the proper time will be offered.

Mr. SPOONER. What does that do?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is on page 5. It changes the language of the act in this way——

Mr. SPOONER. Has it been adopted?

Mr. HEYBURN. It has been offered. It is a committee amendment. No amendments have been adopted and none will be until to-morrow.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator kindly read it?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is on the table with the other amendments and will be acted on.

Mr. KEAN. The amendment has been offered?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; it has been offered. I will read it.

The Secretary of Agriculture shall cause notice thereof to be given to the parties from whom such samples were obtained, and after final judgment public notice of such fact shall be given by publication in such manner as may be prescribed by the rules and regulations of the Department of Agriculture.

It simply provides that after final trial and judgment the public may be advised that a certain medicine has been found vicious under the provisions of this act.

Mr. SPOONER. Does the Senator think that the language "final judgment," located where it is in that amendment, would make it clear that it is the judgment of the court?

Mr. HEYBURN. There can be but one judgment in a case. No tribunal renders judgment except courts.

Mr. HOPKINS. You can make it read "judgment of any court."

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but that would seem to be unnecessary.

Mr. SPOONER. Referring to the examination by the Secretary of Agriculture, it says—

And if after such hearing—

That is, where the man is cited to appear before the Secretary—

it is found that any of the provisions of this act have been violated by such parties, then the Secretary of Agriculture shall so certify the facts to the proper United States district attorney, with a copy of the results of the analysis or the examination of such article, duly authenticated by the analyst or officer making such examination, under the oath of such officer.

Mr. HEYBURN. He certifies the fact.

Mr. SPOONER. Then it is provided that the district attorney shall make the prosecution.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course; he is the proper officer.

Mr. SPOONER. That is why the language which I have just read led me to ask the Senator if he is certain that the words "final judgment" mean the final judgment of the Secretary or the final judgment of the court.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Secretary is not authorized to render judgment or to pronounce one. The Secretary is authorized to do just one thing, and that is to certify the facts as he finds them.

I wish to revert to the first suggestion or criticism of the Senator as to the distinction between judgment and facts. Facts are the result of the exercise of judgment. The fact is the ultimate result of the exercise of judgment. Of course any human being who finds a fact does it in pursuance of the exercise of his judgment. There can be no doubt about that.

Mr. SPOONER. I find the Senator in front of me. I do not exercise much judgment in ascertaining that fact.

Mr. HEYBURN. There are degrees of judgment.

Mr. President, the Senator criticises the tribunal that has been selected for the purpose of determining these matters. I will say freely that I made diligent inquiry as to which of three tribunals, or rather three bureaus of the Government, was best calculated to collect these facts and make them available. I found that the Treasury Department has scattered in rather a bunchy way its qualified officials who might determine or ascertain these facts and that they are not sufficiently disseminated generally throughout the country. I found that the health bureau, to which the Senator refers, is located here and substantially or practically speaking has no other existence than in this capital. I found that the Agricultural Department is equipped with a corps of chemists who are scattered throughout every section of the United States, far exceeding in number and quite equal in experience to those of any other bureau. My conclusion which led to the selection or denomination of the Agricultural Department was acquiesced in by the other Departments. It is conceded that it is the best equipped Department of the Government to ascertain and make available these facts. It is utterly immaterial for the purposes of this legislation what branch of the Government does it. It is material at this time to select that Department best equipped and best qualified to do it.

It has been suggested that certain physiological facts will have to be determined that may not be within the present equipment of the Department of Agriculture. But that Department can provide itself with just as competent and efficient chemists or scientists of any school as any other branch of the Government. I think it is not contemplated by the Department that it will be necessary to enlarge to any considerable extent the number of scientists and chemists who are now in the employ of the Department, and I do not anticipate that that will be done. They are so disseminated throughout the country that they are available in every portion of it.

Then other provisions of the bill provide that the State officials acting through their chemists and their bureaus may also ascertain these facts and present them in the same manner.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Idaho has expired.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not think I will take ten minutes, but I wish to answer briefly the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin, first, that it will probably take a thousand more chemists in the Department of Agriculture. The statement came to us some time ago from the Department of Agriculture that with the present force they then had they could perform this extra service; that they are doing that character of work right along, and that it would require no new machinery and would not materially add to the number of employees.

But there is another reason the Senator urged as against the Agricultural Department. He says the Agricultural Department will be compelled to pass upon the question of a drug, as to its poisonous character and as to whether it will be deleterious. The Senator must read all of the sections of a law together in order to give it a proper construction. The Agricultural Department could not by reason merely of finding that a drug was made up of strychnine take that drug from the markets of the country.

Now, what is the object of the analysis? It is not to determine whether a drug is poisonous, because most of our drugs are poisonous. Therefore that portion of section 2 which relates to drugs in connection with foods must only be applied for the purposes for which the drug analysis is made; and the only purpose for which the drug analysis is made is to ascertain whether it corresponds with the definition of the term "drugs," not whether the drug is poisonous, because most of them are poisonous. If the Senator will turn to the definition of "drugs" he will find that there are only certain things that are necessary to be ascertained in the case of drugs to show that they are adulterated:

First. If, when a drug is sold under or by a name recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary, it differs from the standard of strength, quality, or purity, as determined by the test laid down in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary official at the time of investigation.

That is all the chemist of the Secretary of Agriculture would determine—whether this drug which is sold as a well-known drug corresponds to the formula which is adopted throughout the United States as to the character of that drug. Then:

Provided, That no drug not defined in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary shall be deemed to be adulterated under this provision if the standard of strength, quality—

That, I think, may be modified. It is not an exact copy of the provision it was taken from. The second subdivision simply allows a manufacturer to depart from the standard that is laid down in the Pharmacopœia provided he shows the departure upon the bottle, because every physician in prescribing anything prescribes a medicine that is provided for in this Pharmacopœia, and of that standard and strength.

There are some manufacturers who manufacture half strength, but at the same time they insert upon the label that it is half strength. That is practically all that a chemist shall find, so far as the adulteration is concerned. He also finds as to the misbranding. If it is an imitation, or is offered for sale under the name of another article, of course that he can easily determine.

"If the package containing it, or its label, shall bear any statement," as we now will probably have it, "regarding the constituent of the ingredients or the substances," or if false as to the State in which it is manufactured.

That is all the chemist could do in the matter of drugs. He does not determine whether they are healthful, whether they are poisonous, but whether or not they comply with the standard which the law provides, and the law provides in its definitions exactly what the standards shall be.

So, Mr. President, it seems to me there is no place where this duty could be so well located as in the Agricultural Department. Most of the examinations will probably be of drugs. A great number of them will be of foods. Our laws already provide that the Secretary of Agriculture shall examine the food products of the country and give to the world the publication. When he is doing that under an appropriation which we make every year, why can we not also provide that if he finds in those examinations that they do not correspond to the law, this information which he obtains may also be used.

The further reason has been suggested by the Senator from Idaho, that these chemists are scattered over the whole country, nearest to where the manufacturing establishments are located. They can go right to the manufacturing establishment. They do not have to incur an expense of mileage in sending a chemist from Washington to San Francisco. The Agricultural Department has its chemists located there.

Mr. GALLINGER. What are they doing?

Mr. McCUMBER. They are examining food products. In that case they are examining foods, drugs, and liquors that are imported from foreign countries. In connection with that, of course, they can easily examine the other character of foods, whether they are imported or whether they are domestic goods.

If there is any other Department that can better perform the functions which are imposed upon the Secretary of Agriculture, certainly I do not think there is a Senator who would hesitate for a single moment to transfer this authority to such Department or Bureau.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator turn to section 10? I want to make a suggestion, but I do not know whether it is practicable.

Mr. KEAN. On what page?

Mr. GALLINGER. Page 11.

Mr. SPOONER (reading)—

SEC. 10. That no dealer shall be convicted under the provisions of this act when he can establish a guaranty signed by the wholesaler, jobber, manufacturer, or other party residing in the United States, from whom he purchases such articles, to the effect that the same is not adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, designating such article. Said guaranty, to afford protection, shall contain the name and address of the party or parties making the sale of such articles to such dealer, and in such case said party or parties shall be amenable to the prosecutions, fines, and other penalties which would attach, in due course, to the dealer under the provisions of this act.

A person who has that defense ought not to be proceeded against at all. This implies that complaint shall be lodged against him—that he shall be placed upon trial—but that he may assert in his defense this guaranty. It involves cost to him. It affects his reputation. The charge may be made, not simply by agents of the Agricultural Department, but by food officials of the States. Ought there not to be some method here prescribed by which an exhibition of that guaranty, satisfying the Secretary of Agriculture as to its genuineness, would prevent a man from being proceeded against at all?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the danger seems to me so very remote that it could scarcely be conceivable at all. It is the usual statute in cases, for instance, where a license is granted, where a stamp is used for the sale of intoxicating liquors. No district attorney would knowingly or intentionally, and, in fact, without an absolute abuse of his power, ever think of indicting a person who is selling intoxicating liquors as a wholesale liquor dealer or as a retail liquor dealer until he ascertained whether or not he had exceeded the full effect of the stamps.

Mr. SPOONER. The license is a matter of record, and the district attorney would have to prove——

Mr. McCUMBER. The licenses and the stamps are not always matters of record. The stamps that are used upon beer kegs and that are placed upon the kegs in the places of manufacture are not always recorded. Yet they are a complete defense. I do not know to what extent the mere licenses are given. The fact is the stamp that is given to the retail dealer is not a license. It is a stamp that he pays for and that gives him the authority. The district attorney certainly would inquire into that.

Mr. SPOONER. The district attorney might and the district attorney might not. This is a criminal proceeding, and this statute provides that a man who has that guaranty from the manufacturer is an innocent man.

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well; if the Senator——

Mr. SPOONER. I want to say this to the Senator: Some of the most respectable dealers in Chicago, men of large affairs—Franklin MacVeagh, Sprague, and those people who are not objecting to this bill, except where they think it needs correction—public-spirited men, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] knows, and as the Senator from North Dakota does not—complain of this language; that under it an innocent man is very likely to be prosecuted. It is the theory of the statute, too, that he shall be prosecuted, but that he shall not be convicted if he exhibits on the trial this guaranty. For a criminal statute it is not a fair one.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator it never struck me as possible that the district attorney would ever prosecute without making the investigation, and if he found that there was a complete defense he would neither prosecute nor would any grand jury ever indict. The usual instruction, I understand, to a grand jury in a case of that kind under the law would be that they might inquire whether or not there was a defense of that character. But we can modify that provision.

Mr. SPOONER. It is no trifling thing. Criminal laws ought not to be passed upon the theory that district attorneys will do this or will not do that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose we say that—

Said guaranty shall afford protection against prosecution under the provisions of this act.

Mr. SPOONER. That is right.

Mr. McCUMBER. That would answer the same purpose, and I think the chairman of the committee would agree to that.

Mr. SPOONER. That is right.

Mr. HOPKINS. Insert "prosecuted."

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the word "convicted" insert the word "prosecuted."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be stated at the desk.

Mr. SPOONER. It will cover it all if the word "prosecuted" is inserted.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 24, strike out the word "convicted" and insert "prosecuted."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. SPOONER. With reference to the constitutionality of an important part of the bill, I wish to ask the Senator to look at section 11:

That every person, association of persons, or corporation who manufactures or——

Mr. McCUMBER. I think I know what the Senator refers to and I think I can answer that very quickly.

Mr. SPOONER. What is it?

Mr. McCUMBER. As to the constitutionality of a law compelling a man to furnish evidence against himself.

Mr. SPOONER. That is not all.

Mr. McCUMBER. All right.

Mr. SPOONER. The Supreme Court of the United States has in many cases drawn a distinction, as the Senator is well aware, and which I hope never to see abolished, between commerce and production. The first case in which that was decided, as the Senator knows, was the Knight case, a very strong case. The court held, if I may in a word state the decision, that the mere fact that a firm or an individual or a corporation intended to transport his or its product from the State of manufacture to another State for market, or to another country for market, did not make it interstate commerce as contradistinguished from production.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not until there was some overt act.

Mr. SPOONER. In other cases the court elaborated the argument and sustained the decision. I remember this illustration in one case: The court said that if it were otherwise the Congress would have jurisdiction over all production in the United States substantially, for when the farmer harvests his wheat on the plains of Dakota or gathers his cotton on a plantation in the South, he does it with his eye on the Liverpool market, expecting that he must find a market for his product not simply beyond the limits of his State, but oftentimes beyond the limits of the country; and if a mere purpose to ship to a market beyond the State constituted interstate commerce as contradistinguished from production, over which Congress has no jurisdiction, then every industry of any moment in production would be subject to Congress.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. I hope the Senator will allow me just to finish my statement.

Mr. HEYBURN. Very well.

Mr. SPOONER. Now, there are two things about it. Of course if this bill is to be passed the Senator wants it as free as possible, I take it, from reasonable objection.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator I want it free from that whole section.

Mr. SPOONER. What power has the Government of the United States to send an agent into Texas, and there finding a manufacturer, to demand that he sell to this agent of the Agricultural Department at the price fixed—the usual price—the sample of his manufactured product in order that it may be analyzed under this act by the Chemist of the Department of Agriculture, and that on that analysis he may be prosecuted in the courts of the United States? The Government could buy a sample in the open market, but that would not trace it to the manufacturer; that would leave something to be proven by the Government outside of the possession of the article itself before the manufacturer could be convicted.

There are two things about it. First, it looks to me to be beyond the constitutional power so far as it relates to the manufacturer, and, second, it looks very much as if it were an attempt by act of Congress to compel a man to furnish evidence against himself upon which is to be based a criminal prosecution. I suppose the Senator has considered that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have considered that, and my answer to the legal proposition is this: I agree with the Senator entirely that the mere fact of manufacturing, though there may be an intent to ship to a foreign state, would not make it interstate commerce in any way or commerce at all. It would simply be manufacture, but as soon as the manufacturer has taken the first step toward shipment of the article, then it is manufacturing for shipment. I insist, as a matter of law, that Congress, dealing with interstate commerce and possessing power over interstate commerce, has authority to determine under what conditions any person may engage in interstate commerce; and one of the conditions that Congress may impose is that any person shipping goods into another State—not merely manufacturing them with the intent to ship them, but if it can be established that he is shipping them into another State—after that has been done Congress may demand, as a condition precedent, as it were, that the party so entering into interstate commerce shall give samples the same as it compels him to deliver up samples for the purpose of taxation and otherwise of oleomargarine or any other manufactures that are taxed. We are not compelling them to furnish evidence against themselves. We are simply compelling them to conform to certain requirements. So much as to the legal proposition.

As to the other proposition, as to whether or not this is beneficial, I have always opposed section 11. We inherited this with the old bill; but we have cut it down very materially. The substitute bill of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] extends the same provision over seven or eight pages. I can not see why it is necessary that the Secretary of Agriculture or the chemist shall go into any man's private establishment. If a manufacturer is shipping his goods all over the country, those goods can be found in every retail store of the country, and the agents can purchase as many cans or bottles or whatever they may be wherever they find them; then they can investigate the question and ascertain where the article was manufactured. This very guaranty that is to afford protection to the retailer shows who is the manufacturer. Therefore, when the officer of the Government goes into a retail store, the retailer has this guaranty of purity; he can immediately follow that and find who was the manufacturer of those goods. He, therefore, can procure with very little inconvenience the necessary evidence in every case.

I submit, Mr. President, that I think the Agricultural Department or any other Department or any person should be entitled to get the goods where they will, and that there should be no red tape or no forcing of the Department into the private concerns of the manufacturers in any business. So on my part I shall move at the proper time to entirely eliminate section 11 by striking out the whole matter, not but what I think there is a legal authority for it, although that may be questionable.

Mr. SPOONER. I will not discuss the question with the Senator, but I want to call his attention to another thing.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator from Idaho wishes to answer further on the proposition.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will pardon me a moment——

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not desire any other section to be taken up until I have an opportunity to answer the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I am obliged to leave the Chamber for a few moments, and I should like to call attention to one thing that looks to me rather ridiculous, although it may appear differently upon explanation.

Mr. HEYBURN. In another section of the bill?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. HEYBURN. While the Senator was on his feet discussing his amendment, I desired to interrupt him, but he declined to be interrupted, and then at the close of his remarks he yielded to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. Now it is proposed to take up another section, and that means that the argument will be disconnected. But as the Senator says he desires to leave the room, of course I will defer the discussion of the matter, as I do not desire to answer the Senator when he is not here.

Mr. SPOONER. I will remain. I did not know that the Senator from Idaho also intended to answer.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire very briefly to point out, in answer to the legal objection urged by the Senator from Wisconsin as to section 11. The Senator seems to assume that it is provided that before these articles have become a part of interstate commerce a demand might be made upon the manufacturer for a sample. It is not so provided. The bill provides in the second line of section 11:

> That every person, association of persons, or corporation who manufactures or produces and delivers—

Those terms are coupled with "delivers"— > delivers for interstate or foreign shipment or transportation.

So that the private title or character of the goods has ceased before the right is given to the public officer to demand a sample, and the articles have already become the subject of interstate commerce by the very terms of the section. That is the answer to the Senator's criticism that we would be invading the private rights of the manufacturer to demand of him a sample of goods that might or might not become the subject of interstate commerce. The section provides that the article must have been delivered for that purpose before the demand can be made. That is the answer to the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, it is not an answer; but I do not intend to pursue this subject at all. If the manufacturer has shipped a great many consignments into another State, that would of course give the Government no right whatever to go to his place of manufacture in a State and demand that he furnish a sample of what had been shipped theretofore or a sample of what he might ship thereafter.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. This bill does not provide that the demand may be made for a sample of the goods that have been shipped. It provides that the sample may be demanded of the goods which have been delivered for that purpose, for the purpose of interstate commerce, and not for a sample of the goods on hand that might or might not be similar to those that had been shipped.

Mr. SPOONER. I was assuming that if the manufacturer had shipped to the Senator from Idaho and had delivered to a carrier for shipment a consignment of goods, so that they were in interstate commerce, it would be beyond his power to go and take out of that consignment a sample and give to the Government. I may be mistaken about that. I think, however, I am not. I only suggest this in order that if I am right the provision may be changed.

Section 13 seems a little odd. It says:

> That any article of food, drug, or liquor that is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, and is being transported from one State, Territory, district, or insular possession, to another for sale, or, having been transported, remains unloaded, unsold, or in original unbroken packages, or if it be sold or offered for sale in the District of Columbia or the Territories, or insular possessions of the United States, or if it be imported from a foreign country for sale, or if it is intended for export to a foreign country, shall be liable to be proceeded against in any district court of the United States within the district where the same is found, and seized for confiscation by a process of libel for condemnation.

To that I see no objection.

> And if such article is condemned as being adulterated or misbranded, or of a poisonous or deleterious character, within the meaning of this act, the same shall be disposed of by destruction or sale, as the said court may direct, etc.

If it is condemned as poisonous, condemned as food put into interstate commerce in violation of law, upon the ground that it would be, if used by any human being, detrimental to health because it was an adulteration, why should they condemn it for that reason? Why should there be a contemplation here in the statute——

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has not read all the sentence.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, I have.

Mr. McCUMBER. "But such goods shall not be sold in any jurisdiction contrary to the laws of that judisdiction."

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; but they may be sold in some other jurisdiction, and that is worse.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. HEYBURN. I only want to finish my reply to that.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not desire to take the Senator off the floor. I merely ask to interrupt him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] had the floor, but the Chair understood that he had yielded it to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the Senator, I think, has not observed that the expression is in the alternative, and that it is left to the court to determine what would be the appropriate disposition to be made of the article.

Mr. SPOONER. I had not conceived it possible that Congress should be authorizing a court, which has condemned an article because of poison in it deleterious to the health of any human being, to sell it in any jurisdiction.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the bill does not provide that the court shall have that right any more than the right to exercise its judgment. There are poisons that may be put to a legitimate use. You might have 10 gallons of an active poison that might be put to a legitimate use, because poisons are used in a legitimate way for purposes other than home consumption. It might be that the law would not find it necessary to confiscate the article, but to simply require the party to keep it out of the general mass of foods.

Mr. FULTON. I call the attention of the Senator who has the floor to this language:

> And if such article is condemned as being adulterated or misbranded—

Suppose that was all there was of it, or, rather, suppose it was of a poisonous or deleterious character, there certainly would be no objection to selling by the order of the court merchandise that might have been adulterated or misbranded. To be poisonous or of a deleterious character is one thing, and adulterated or misbranded is another; and it would be a wise discretion in the court to order them to be condemned, destroyed, or sold.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is in the alternative.

Mr. FULTON. It is to be assumed, I presume, that the poisonous articles would be condemned.

Mr. SPOONER. This is predicated upon a prior condemnation, "if such article is condemned as being adulterated;" otherwise the court has no jurisdiction over it. It is a judgment of condemnation upon an article, a proceeding in rem, to give the court any power of disposition at all.

Mr. McCUMBER. The power is given to dispose of it by destruction or sale. It is left to the court to determine whether to destroy deleterious articles unfit to be sold in any market. Those are to be destroyed. Let us take the case of flour. We may have flour that is almost wholly ordinary flour. It is sold by carload lots, and it is sold as gluten flour, when, as a matter of fact, it is nothing but ordinary flour. The court condemns it. What would the court do? He allows it to be sold, and to be sold as it is, not as gluten flour. He allows the manufacturer, on giving bond that it shall not be sold as gluten flour, to take it back; but if the flour is condemned and is not taken back the proceeds of its sale shall be turned into the Treasury.

There is nothing to compel, and I hardly think that the court, taking the spirit of the law, would construe that he had authority to sell under this bill or to order the sale of poisonous or deleterious matter. But using the conjunction "or" there gives him the right to either destroy it, allow the purchaser to take it back by giving a bond, or to sell it if it is such an article as can be sold for what it is.

Mr. SPOONER. One thing more. I should like to ask the Senator if some better word than the word "added," which has been talked about so much, can not be found in line 19, page 4?

Mr. McCUMBER. Is the Senator reading from the new print of the bill?

Mr. SPOONER. No; it is the old print, I think.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will give the section I can tell better.

Mr. SPOONER. Section 4.

Mr. McCUMBER. What line?

Mr. SPOONER. I will read where it occurs.

And if it shall appear from any such examination that such specimens are adulterated or misbranded or contain any added poisonous or deleterious substance or ingredient, etc.

Mr. McCUMBER. The shippers and the manufacturers of goods fear that if we do not use the word "added"——

Mr. SPOONER. I think some word ought to be used, but is that a good word?

Mr. McCUMBER. I think so.

Mr. SPOONER. I have inquired of several physicians in regard to the matter, and they do not easily understand it.

Mr. McCUMBER. It seems to me it is a good word because there are many articles which in their natural state contain poison. Fruit contains fusel oil. That is a poison, but it is inherent in the fruit itself.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes. But if you mean by "added ingredient" that an article contains some substance, whether it be poisonous or not, that is not inherent, that is understandable. The word "added" is not simply predicated, nor predicable, upon the article in its natural condition. A drug may have been prepared and it may not be in its natural condition at all. The same may be true of food. But how is it certain that the word "added," which occurs several times——

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator himself might suggest a word that will apply if he desires to make that point. I do not see much difference. The Senator suggested the word "inherent"—"not inherent in the article itself." If the Senator would like that better——

Mr. SPOONER. It is not what I like. I am only asking the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am asking the Senator's opinion. I have a great deal of respect for his suggestions. I myself do not see the objection to "added," because it means something not inherent.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think the word "inherent" is a good word.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, we might think it over. I do not think of any other word that will better express it.

Mr. KEAN. If the Senator will yield to me, I will move an executive session, if he does not intend to go on any further with the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. McCUMBER. I have no objection to an executive session if the Senator from Idaho has none.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have no objection to going into executive session at this time.

Mr. KEAN. Then, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. LODGE. Will the Senator yield to me to make a request?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

ELECTION OF SENATORS.

Mr. LODGE. I ask that the speech of my late colleague, Mr. Hoar, in regard to the election of Senators by direct vote of the people, be printed as a Senate document. There is a great demand for it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

Mr. KEAN. I ask that double the usual number of copies may be printed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey asks that double the usual number of copies be printed. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the order was agreed to, as follows:

Ordered, That 1,682 additional copies of Senate Document No. —, speech of Senator George F. Hoar, on "Election of Senators by direct vote of the people," be printed for the use of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I renew my motion for an executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After eight minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE CASTOR, OF PENNSYLVANIA.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. GEORGE A. CASTOR, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had appointed Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. MORRELL, Mr. MCCREARY, Mr. MOON, Mr. KLINE, Mr. DEEMER, of Pennsylvania; Mr. WEISSE, of Wisconsin; Mr. SMYSER, of Ohio; Mr. KELIHER, of Massachusetts; Mr. RIVES, Mr. WILSON, of Illinois, and Mr. JONES, of Virginia, members of the committee on the part of the House to attend the funeral.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the resolutions of the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 20, 1906.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. GEORGE A. CASTOR, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to transmit this resolution to the Senate and a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That a committee of thirteen Members of the House, with such members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect this House do now adjourn.

The Speaker announced the appointment of Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. ADAMS, Mr. MORRELL, Mr. MCCREARY, Mr. MOON, Mr. KLINE, Mr. DEEMER, of Pennsylvania; Mr. WEISSE, of Wisconsin; Mr. SMYSER, of Ohio; Mr. KELIHER, of Massachusetts; Mr. RIVES, Mr. WILSON, of Illinois, and Mr. JONES, of Virginia, members of the committee on the part of the House.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I offer the resolutions which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania submits resolutions which will be read.

The Secretary read the resolutions, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. GEORGE A. CASTOR, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That a committee of four Senators be appointed by the Vice-President to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions submitted by the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair appoints as members of the committee on the part of the Senate, under the second resolution, the Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. PENROSE; the Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. KNOX; the Senator from Montana, Mr. CARTER, and the Senator from Georgia, Mr. CLAY.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the late Representative from Pennsylvania, I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 12 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 21, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 20, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Our Father in heaven, we thank Thee for those strange and mysterious voices which are ever calling unto us out of the deeps of our nature to come up higher, into the intellectual, moral, and spiritual realm. God grant that we may heed the call; that our lives may grow larger and larger day by day; that we may be fitted for the life to come.

Once more we are called upon to mourn the loss of one of our Congressional family, a man whose character was conspicuous in his home, in the community, and upon the floor of this House for its fidelity to truth and duty. God grant that the angels of love and mercy may minister unto his colleagues, his friends, and to the dear ones of his heart, and make them realize that he has only gone before, into one of those many mansions prepared by the Lord Jesus Christ for those that love Him.

Hear us and answer our prayer, in the name of Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ELIJAH SPANGLER.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to return to the House of Representatives House bill 1059, granting an increase of pension to Elijah Spangler.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Mr. Speaker, the occasion of that is the fact that the beneficiary is dead.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman that he change it into the form of a concurrent resolution.

Mr. SULLOWAY. Will the Clerk please make that amendment?

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 28, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress shall be filled by the reappointment of Richard Olney, a citizen of Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. This is a Senate joint resolution. The Senate copy of the resolution does not seem to be with the Clerk. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Minnesota that he withhold the resolution for the present.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE CASTOR, OF PENNSYLVANIA.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I rise to perform the saddest duty that can fall to the lot of a Member of this House. I rise to announce the death of my colleague, Mr. GEORGE A. CASTOR, late a Representative from the Third Congressional district of Pennsylvania.

At a later date I shall ask the House to set aside a day for proper testimonials to the high character and good work of Mr. CASTOR.

I offer the following resolutions, which I send to the Clerk's desk, and move their adoption.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers the following resolutions, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. GEORGE A. CASTOR, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That a committee of thirteen Members of the House, with such members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be directed to transmit these resolutions to the Senate and a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The resolutions were agreed to.

The SPEAKER announced as the committee on the part of the House: Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania, Mr. MORRELL, Mr. McCREARY of Pennsylvania, Mr. MOON of Pennsylvania, Mr. SMYSER, Mr. RIVES, Mr. WILSON of Illinois, Mr. DEEMER, Mr. WEISSE, Mr. JONES of Virginia, Mr. KLINE, and Mr. KELIHER.

Mr. ADAMS of Pennsylvania. I also offer the following resolution:

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect, the House do now adjourn.

The resolution was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 28) to fill a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I present a number of memorials from the women of Wyoming, protesting against the seating of REED SMOOT as a Senator. A letter accompanies the memorial asking that I may say a few words regarding the subject.

I merely wish to say at this time that the whole matter is before the appropriate committee of the United States Senate, and I shall hope to be enlightened by a report made from that committee.

If requested further to make a statement in advance of the report of the committee, I should be inclined to indorse, in the main, what was said by the Senator from California [Mr. PERKINS] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PATTERSON] a few days ago in the Senate upon this subject.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The memorials will be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. GALLINGER introduced a bill (S. 4603) making the Public Library of the District of Columbia a designated depository for Government publications; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Library.

Mr. PLATT introduced a bill (S. 4604) for the relief of the estate of William Van Name, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. PENROSE introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 4605) granting an increase of pension to Stephen W. Pomeroy; and

A bill (S. 4606) granting an increase of pension to Kate Gilmore.

Mr. PENROSE introduced a bill (S. 4607) prescribing offenses against the postal service, amending existing statutes relating to said service, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas introduced a bill (S. 4608) granting a pension to George W. Walter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ELKINS introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (S. 4609) for the relief of George Randolph Rogers;

A bill (S. 4610) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Sylvester B. Miller and grant him an honorable discharge (with an accompanying paper); and

A bill (S. 4611) for the relief of John H. Snyder.

Mr. ELKINS introduced a bill (S. 4612) granting a pension to Jesse A. Thomas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4613) granting a pension to Margaret Birchfield; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FRAZIER introduced a bill (S. 4614) to authorize the President to appoint James F. Curley, Harry T. Herring, and Carroll H. Gardner on the retired list of the Army with the rank of second lieutenant; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. MONEY introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Claims:

A bill (S. 4615) for the relief of Mrs. Emily R. Martin;

A bill (S. 4616) for the relief of the estate of Mrs. E. J. Matlock, deceased;

A bill (S. 4617) for the relief of William R. Butler;

A bill (S. 4618) for the relief of the estate of John Graham, deceased; and

A bill (S. 4619) for the relief of John E. Pearson (with accompanying papers).

Mr. CLAY introduced a bill (S. 4620) for the relief of the heirs of Thomas J. Williams, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. McCREARY introduced a bill (S. 4621) for the relief of the Baptist Church, Crab Orchard, Ky.; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4622) granting an increase of pension to Isaiah McDaniel; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CARTER introduced a bill (S. 4623) for the relief of Sarah E. Baxter, executrix of the last will and testament of Warren S. Baxter; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4624) to facilitate the acquisition of rights of way for reservoir sites for irrigation purposes in the arid and semiarid States and Territories; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. TILLMAN introduced a bill (S. 4625) for the relief of the heirs of Theodore Dehon; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

INSPECTION OF HULLS AND BOILERS.

Mr. FORAKER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4300) to amend section 4414 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, inspectors of hulls and boilers of steam vessels; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

REORGANIZATION OF PUBLIC SCHOOLS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask to have printed as a Senate document a letter from E. B. Stocking, a well-known citizen of the District of Columbia, relative to the matter of the reorganization of the public school system in the District of Columbia.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia asks that the letter presented by him be printed as a Senate document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time as may be necessary to report such hearings and proceedings as may be had before such committee, or its subcommittees, in connection with matters pending before it, and to have the same printed for its use, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed, and the Chair lays before the Senate the bill (S. 88) commonly known as the "pure-food bill."

Mr. MORGAN. After consultation with the Senator who has in charge the pure-food bill and some other Senators, as I deem it necessary to have a very brief executive session, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After ten minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

PURE-FOOD BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 88) for preventing the manufacture, sale, or transportation of adulterated or misbranded or poisonous or deleterious foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors, and for regulating traffic therein, and for other purposes.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I desire this morning to present some resolutions bearing upon the bill. I send to the desk for reading, first, a letter from the chairman of the American Medical Association.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION,
Cincinnati, Ohio, February 20, 1906.

MY DEAR SIR: The American Medical Association by unanimous petition of the medical profession from each of over 2,000 counties of the United States, reaffirmed by the recent action of its legislative council, respectfully asks you to vote for the "Heyburn pure food and drug bill." Such action on your part will receive the gratitude of over 135,000 physicians of the country.

Very respectfully, CHARLES A. L. REED, Chairman.

Hon. WELDON B. HEYBURN,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. HEYBURN. I send to the desk an accompanying document, and ask that it be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read as follows:

ACTION OF THE AMERICAN MEDICAL ASSOCIATION ON THE HEYBURN PURE FOOD AND DRUG BILL.

To the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled:

The American Medical Association, through its legislative council in session at Washington, D. C., January 9, 10, and 11, 1906, unanimously adopted the following:

"Your committee appointed to consider legislation for honest foods and pure drugs begs leave to report that it has considered the suggestions of the chairman and has examined in detail the provisions of the Heyburn and Hepburn bills, and finds nothing in these bills, which, in the opinion of the members of the committee, would injuriously affect any legitimate business concerned in the manufacture and sale of foods, liquors, or drugs, and that the bills, or either of them, would afford adequate protection to honest manufacturers of and dealers in such products, and security against imposition, fraud, or danger to the buyer.

"Furthermore, your committee respectfully recommends that the remarks of the chairman, Doctor Reed, be considered and transmitted to Congress as a part of this report."

REMARKS OF THE CHAIRMAN, DR. CHARLES A. L. REED, RELATIVE TO THE PURE FOOD AND DRUG BILL.

After reviewing the previous history of the Heyburn pure food and drug bill, and calling attention to the fact that it had been made the subject of a general referendum to the medical profession, with the result that over 2,000 petitions from as many counties in the United States had been received and forwarded to Congress, the chairman, Doctor Reed, added:

"It is probably unnecessary for you again to make it—the Heyburn pure food and drug bill—the subject of a general referendum, as the petitions and correspondence previously sent to Senator HEYBURN are being utilized before the present Congress. It is important, however, that the medical profession, and, for that matter, the public should be informed of the character of the opposition which was aroused by the measure before the last Congress. This opposition was active, insistent, persistent, and, judging from the results, as well as from its boasts, was effective. An analysis of the proceedings in committee shows that the antagonism was derived from the manufacturers of blended and otherwise adulterated liquors, from the fabricators of foodless foods, from importers of foods and medicines so worthless as to be denied a market in Europe where they are made, from the makers and purveyors of worthless, dangerous and enslaving drugs—interests which, in the aggregate, and judged by the character of their business, can not go clean-handed into any court of justice or command an honest footing before any legislative committee or legislative body in the country.

"The interest of the medical profession in this measure is aroused from the special and intimate knowledge possessed by physicians of the influence of impure food on the public health, but more particularly of the disastrous results arising not only from the widespread consumption of mere nostrums, but from the dispensing of medicines, many of which fall below the pharmaceutical standard. As a matter of fact, while the Pharmacopœia assumes to establish a certain standard of drugs there is at present no national law, nor, so far as I am informed, any State law to enforce that standard. As a consequence, manufacturing establishments, some of them enjoying a high grade of commercial respectability, openly acknowledge that they manufacture pharmaceutical preparations of varying degrees of purity. They plead, in extenuation, that this is to meet the demands of the market. The better druggists—those enjoying a high-class trade—are presumed to dispense the purest of the preparations. Those located in middle-class localities take the second grade, while the lowest, or third grade, is sold to public health departments, hospitals, eleemosynary institutions, and country drug stores, but more especially to the country practitioners who dispense their own medicines. That there should be any but one grade, and that the highest grade of pharmaceutical preparations, is an idea so repugnant to every sense of honesty, decency, and common humanity that the present situation becomes revolting. If, then, we go a step further and consider that class of copyrighted preparations that are dispensed by physicians—the so-called "professional proprietaries"—we discover that the trade interests are absolutely without other restraint than that which is presumed to come from the effects, assumed or demonstrated, of such medicaments on the patients to whom they are administered. In this class of remedies there is not even theoretically a pharmaceutical standard, save as it applies to the ingredients of compounds, and there is now no law that will hold the manufacturers of such remedies to the standard which they assume to establish for themselves.

"To meet this condition the American Medical Association has established a council on pharmacy and chemistry, which is doing voluntarily, in a purely advisory way, what ought to be done by the National Government—namely, analyzing and testing these preparations for the purpose of advising the medical profession, and, for that matter, the public, of their true character. It is obvious, however, that this movement, salutary as it is, can not be sufficiently far-reaching to keep our interstate commerce from being loaded down with preparations, many of which are essentially fraudulent in character. Under these circumstances, I feel that it is important that the council reaffirm its previous action, and by such means as it may select to express its high appreciation of the service which has already been rendered by Senator HEYBURN, chairman of the Senate Committee on Manufactures, and by Mr. HEPBURN, chairman of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, in endeavoring to secure the passage of these salutary laws."

C. S. BACON, Secretary.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to send to the desk a resolution to be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it, without objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolutions of the New York Young Friends' Association relative to the Heyburn pure-food bill.

To the honorable Senators from the State of New York—Messrs. CHAUNCEY M. DEPEW and THOMAS C. PLATT.

GENTLEMEN: As secretary of the New York Friends' Association, I am directed to forward to you copies of the following resolutions, viz:

Whereas the prosperity and happiness of a nation depends largely upon the health of the people, and the health of the people is vitally dependent upon the purity of the food products and medicinal agents: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the Young Friends' Association of New York and Brooklyn, assembled in regular meeting on the 11th day of the second month, 1906, do earnestly advocate the passage of the bill known as the "Heyburn pure-food bill," which is now before the United States Senate; and be it further

Resolved, That we urge the Senators from this State to use their influence in every way to secure the passage of this bill; and it is further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to Senator DEPEW, Senator PLATT, and Senator HEYBURN.

Dated New York, February 11, 1906.

Respectfully,

PERCY RUSSELL, D. D. S., President.
HENRY M. HAVILAND, Secretary.

Mr. PENROSE rose.

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, there seems to be some misapprehension, or at least I am laboring under a misapprehension, regarding the status of the two amendments offered by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] day before yesterday. I desire to have the matter clearly defined before the Senate as to the status of those amendments relative to the blended-whisky question. I understand the junior Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] offered an amendment, which was accepted by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], and there was some suggestion made at the time that the amendments offered by the Senator from Ohio should be withdrawn. I hope that is not the case, as I am informed that the amendment suggested as a compromise does not meet the requirements of the situation, and in order to have the purposes carried out of those who object to the bill in its present form it is necessary to adhere to the original amendments of the Senator from Ohio and endeavor to have them inserted in the bill.

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I will have in a moment what was said on that subject by looking at the RECORD. Another Senator will find it for me. My recollection is that I offered the amendment which appears in the reprint of the bill on page 11, to strike out in line 8 the word "added;" and to strike out lines 13, 14, and 15, as indicated, and to insert what follows in caps, printed in lines 15, 16, 17, and 18.

It was suggested to me during the progress of the discussion that the purpose of the amendments I had offered would be better accomplished by striking out the word "goods" after the word "proprietary" in line 25, on page 10 of the bill, and inserting thereafter "foods, drugs, or liquors," so as to read "proprietary foods, drugs, or liquors," the purpose of the amendment being to make it unnecessary to put the formula by which these liquors were blended or mixed on the label.

At the time that suggestion was made I supposed that amendment would accomplish the purpose I had in view, and I was about to ask that it be accepted, when some Senator, perhaps the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY], interrupted to say that he understood we had an agreement that no amendments should be voted upon at that time, and upon that suggestion it went over, I making the remark, if I recollect correctly, that it might lie on the table, and I would not withdraw the other amendment until this amendment should be disposed of. Now I am shown by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] the RECORD, which will inform us exactly what did occur. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] interrupted and said:

I understood that there would be no vote to-day on any of the amendments.

Mr. FORAKER. No.

Mr. MONEY. Does the Senator want a vote on his amendment now?

Mr. FORAKER. I offer the amendment now to have it voted on when it is reached, if there be any objection.

Mr. MONEY. Very well.

Mr. FORAKER. Then I will let the other amendment stand.

* * * * * * *

Mr. FORAKER. Let the amendment be printed and lie on the table until it is voted on.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, such will be the order of the Senate.

Mr. MONEY and Mr. TILLMAN addressed the Chair.

That, I believe, is all; at least it is all that it is indicated was said at that time pertinent to the Senator's inquiry, and that expresses the status of these amendments better than I could.

Mr. PENROSE. Then I am correct in my understanding that the Senate will have an opportunity of voting upon the two amendments of the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. HOPKINS. There is no objection on the part of the committee to those amendments, is there?

Mr. FORAKER. I do not know whether they object to either or both, or how it is. If the Senator will allow me, I will not trespass on his time unduly, but I wish to say that at the time when I offered that amendment I had never seen anyone who could give me information in regard to the matter, and I had no information except what was imparted by the letters which I read, some of which I put in the RECORD. Since then a gentleman claiming to represent these people, an attorney, called my attention to the character of the amendment, and I do not know but what he is right that the word "vatted," which excited so much comment the other day, ought to be included. But whether it should be or not, I think the other amendment is perhaps the only safe one to be employed to prevent the printing of the formula on the label. In that event, if it should be adopted, I would not ask that the other be.

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to know definitely, Mr. President, whether the two amendments offered by the Senator from Ohio will be voted upon by the Senate at the proper time, because, if they have been withdrawn or are not before the Senate I desire to renew them.

Mr. FORAKER. I will offer the original amendment in view of what was said to me unless the Senator will do that. I do not care to offer two amendments on the subject. I offered the second one only upon the theory that it was the equivalent in making it unnecessary to print the formula on the label.

Mr. LODGE. May I ask the Senator a question? By withdrawing his second amendment, does he mean by his amendment to strike out the word "added?"

Mr. FORAKER. That was included in the first. The information I have with respect to that is of such character that I think the word "added" ought to be stricken out as a matter of fact.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly it ought.

Mr. FORAKER. I think it should be stricken out, and upon this theory, that no whisky should be sold that has any fusel oil in it beyond that which the Pharmacopœia states is in it when it is suitable to be sold for consumption.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understood the Senator from Ohio to state that no whisky sold contains fusel oil.

Mr. FORAKER. No; I did not say that. I say I think that no whisky should be sold for consumption that has fusel oil in it beyond the mere trace which I understand the Pharmacopœia says there shall be after it is ready for consumption, after whisky is properly aged and the fusel oil has passed out of it.

Mr. TILLMAN. In regard to the proposed amendment, striking out the word "added," which the Senator says ought to go out, I tried to convince the few who listened to me the other day that if you strike out that word "added" it will open the door wide for the most outrageous adulteration.

I think I can make it very clear to anyone who will pay attention why the word "added" should remain. As I stated, then, the basis of all common whiskies, blended whiskies, and rectified whiskies that are sold in the market is spirits or alcohol. There are two types of alcohol on the market—one cologne spirits, out of which all fusel oil has been taken, and the other is alcohol as it comes from the still with the fusel oil in it. The latter form is used largely in the manufacture of medicines, in chemistry, for fuel, and that kind of thing, when, of course, it is not necessary to extract the fusel oil from it. But if anyone wants to get a harmless alcoholic drink with this poisonous substance—fusel oil—out of it, he must buy deodorized alcohol or cologne spirits, which cost 6 or 8 cents more per gallon than crude alcohol.

If you do not leave the word "added" in the provision in regard to liquors or whiskies so called, you simply leave the door wide open for the rectifier or the manufacturer of common grades of liquor that are sold on the market to take the crude alcohol with the fusel oil in it, add coloring matter, add flavor by means of essential oils, and add anything else that he sees fit—beading oil for one thing, as I instanced the other day—which are all adulterations and all more or less injurious. The rectifier, therefore, adulterates the whisky to make it meaner than it would be with the fusel oil alone in it. The fusel oil being poisonous itself, and therefore very unhealthy, they disguise it, make it palatable, and bamboozle the purchaser into buying it by adding other ingredients which disguise it. In other words, they color it in the first place, then beading oil is added, by which they make it have the appearance of whisky, when it is known that alcohol of no kind will bead; in other words, there will be no bubble when it is poured from one glass to another, whereas any good whisky will always have a bead.

Therefore these adulterants of beading oil and of coloring matter of various kinds—logwood dyes, aniline dyes, tobacco, burnt caramel, prune juice, and I do not know what else—are adulterants which can be added if you strike this word "added" out.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TILLMAN. With great pleasure. I may not be making myself clearly understood.

Mr. LODGE. "An article shall be deemed adulterated if it contain any ingredient of a poisonous or deleterious character." That is the provision, and it applies to any poisonous ingredient, whether added or whether there before.

Mr. TILLMAN. No.

Mr. LODGE. Why would not the provision be just as sweeping and complete without that word?

Mr. TILLMAN. For the simple reason that that is provided for somewhere else in the bill, I presume. Certainly it will not be disputed that the basis of these cheap whiskies is spirits. If you simply say, "any ingredient of a poisonous or deleterious character," you will just simply stop the whole manufacture of common whisky. If you say that fusel oil is not an added ingredient, and if you do not permit the punishment to attach when they are allowed to add these other things, how are you going to detect it?

Mr. LODGE. The punishment does attach, whether it is added or not. Why does not the penalty apply if it is there in any form, whether added or not?

Mr. TILLMAN. It may not be so easy to prove that a coloring matter is poisonous, and it might not be so easy to prove that beading oil is poisonous, because the quantity would be so small that probably the chemist would not be able to detect it.

Mr. LODGE. There is a great deal more fusel oil found in the analysis of whisky before it is blended than afterwards. As I understand it, the effect of this word "added" is for the direct benefit of what are known, I suppose, as the straight whiskies—whiskies in bond—and the effect of it is to put out of business all the blenders and rectifiers.

Mr. TILLMAN. It may put out of business the dirty blenders and rectifiers——

Mr. LODGE. No.

Mr. TILLMAN. The low type, the more greedy, who are absolutely indifferent to money-making.

Mr. LODGE. No; I do not mean that it will affect them, but it will allow the original maker to produce a poisonous and deleterious character of liquor.

Mr. TILLMAN. No, I do not think that, for the reason that the blended liquors, the fine blended whiskies, are manufactured from cologne spirits, the very purest form of alcohol that can be made; and old two-stamp whisky or straight whisky from the Government warehouses, that has been aged and has obtained enough of aroma and flavor to add, say, 10 gallons to 50 gallons of cologne spirits, makes a fine whisky. Then you add some coloring matter, caramel and one thing or another, to give it smoothness and a little sweetness, so that it will not be so biting; and in that way you get your fine goods. If you want pure whisky, you will never get a colored whisky unless it is taken from the charred barrels.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me that without the word "added," the provision covers all forms of whisky, and with the word "added" it covers only the blended or rectified whiskies. It is not to be supposed that there are no bad whiskies with poisonous ingredients among those which have been blended or rectified, as there are probably cheap and bad whiskies which have not been blended, what are called "straight whiskies," I believe. Is not that the case?

Mr. TILLMAN. No doubt there are all kinds of whiskies, according to the skill of the distiller; but so far as I have been able to discover, it is considered that the ordinary type of moonshiner, or small manufacturer, who never makes more than two and a half or three gallons from a bushel of grain, makes the finest whisky, because of his not extracting all the alcohol, and, therefore, not all the fusel oil; and his whisky is the best in the world; but the man who by the use of steam and chemical processes extracts every particle of alcohol in the grain, will get from four and a half to five gallons of alcohol from a bushel of grain. But that is not at all considered by those who drink whisky, and who think it the best article of whisky. The word "added"——

Mr. LODGE. I suppose the word "added" narrows the application of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. The word "added" broadens the application of the bill, so as not only to prohibit the sale of whiskies containing poisonous or deleterious ingredients naturally, but also those that may be added to adulterate it. It narrows the provision to strike out the word "added," and very materially reduces the chances to punish these adulterators.

Mr. LODGE. That is just the point I can not understand.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have tried to show the Senator that if you strike out the word "added," you leave the door wide open to these people to put beading oil and coloring matter into the liquor.

Mr. LODGE. Why?

Mr. TILLMAN. Because they are added ingredients.

Mr. LODGE. No. They are simply ingredients, and it does not make any difference whether added or not, they come within the law.

Mr. TILLMAN. But in the ingredients from which the whisky is made there are poisonous or deleterious substances without a particle of addition—that is, when they are new.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. That takes time.

Mr. LODGE. But these are all excluded if you leave the word "added" in.

Mr. TILLMAN. I still contend that the word "added" broadens the scope of the punitive feature and puts men within the purview of the law to be punished who would be left out and left loose if you do not have that word in.

Mr. LODGE. But without the word "added," it seems to me the provision is better.

Mr. TILLMAN. But it is so broad that you could not catch anybody under it, and it may be construed to stop the sale of new whisky altogether.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I should like to direct the Senator's attention to the fact that this is merely a definition of the word. The word "adulterate" means to degrade; to lessen the character of the thing by mixing with it something of a lesser value of a degraded character.

Now, this is not a prohibitive section of this statute. It is merely a definition. It says that the mingling of an added poison with the thing itself would constitute an adulteration of it. Well, it probably would, in any event, and the courts probably would hold that to take an article that was, as whisky is when it is distilled, in its natural condition as it comes from the still and mix anything with it that was of a character that would degrade it or would lessen its value, that would be to adulterate it. But this bill, in order to make that certain in describing what shall constitute the adulteration of these articles, whether it be foods, drugs, or liquors, says that in the case of liquors the article shall be deemed adulterated if it contain any added ingredient of poison. In other words, if you add to the venom of the article itself for destructive purposes, or the capacity of it to injure those who use it. That is the object of introducing the word "added," because there are many legitimate substances in commerce that contain in their natural condition certain percentages of deleterious substances, poisonous in whole or in part, and this is intended simply to provide that if you add to those substances, no matter what the degree of deleteriousness may be, you have degraded the article to the extent that you have added other poisonous substances to it. That is what it means. It is merely a definition. Other portions of the bill deal with the subject, so far as prohibition in commerce of these articles is concerned or punishment for engaging in it; but to strike out the word "added" here would be an admission that if a thing contains 5 per cent poison, it would be no offense to add another 5 per cent to it and make it that much more dangerous.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. PENROSE. It may be that I am somewhat stupid on this matter, but I can not see how striking out the word "added" narrows this paragraph, and how, on the contrary, it does not greatly broaden it. I should like to ask the Senator if the word "added" is retained, how the phraseology of that section can be made to apply to what is known as "straight whisky," which contains a larger amount of fusel oil, say, for instance, than is permitted by the standard Pharmacopœia, which, I believe, only permits a trace. Is there anything in the wording of the bill so long as the word "added" is in it which would reach whisky containing a poisonous amount of fusel oil? It seems to me that the mere presence of the word "added" there looks like an effort to strike down blended whisky and permit all the poisonous straight whisky in the country to be sold all over the land.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I will instance a point. Cologne spirits, as has been said by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], contain no fusel oil. The high grade of blended spirits is made with cologne spirits as a base. The word "added" would, through its application, prohibit the adding of fusel oil to that whisky for any purpose whatever if it had been made upon the base of cologne spirits, which contains none.

Mr. PENROSE. But how would it reach the case of straight whisky in which the fusel oil was inherent and had not been eliminated by age, or the various processes by which it is eliminated, into a mere trace, which is the largest amount of fusel oil permitted in the Pharmacopœia? How would this amendment reach that case where fusel oil has not been added, but is inherent in the whisky?

Mr. HEYBURN. It does not reach it at all, but there are other provisions in this bill that do.

Mr. PENROSE. Will the Senator point out to me—now I am getting down to what I am after—what part of this bill will reach that case?

Mr. HEYBURN. The provision that prohibits the sale or commerce in any article that is deleterious to human health.

Mr. PENROSE. In other words, the straight-whisky people are taken in under the general dragnet clause—which I do not suppose can have any practical effect—whereas the blended-whisky people are singled out to be punished and have their goods discriminated against and prejudiced in the public mind.

Mr. HEYBURN. Not unless the blended-whisky men desire to add fusel oil to their product, and that they should not be permitted to do.

Mr. PENROSE. I will ask the Senator whether he has any objection to specifically having a provision inserted here applicable to the straight-whisky product which has fusel oil in it?

Mr. HEYBURN. What kind of a provision, I would ask the Senator?

Mr. PENROSE. That all straight whisky shall be of the standard established in the American Pharmacopœia.

Mr. HEYBURN. As I said yesterday in discussing the amendment proposed by another Senator, that would be to enter upon the fixing of standards. The Pharmacopœia is made the standard for determining the purity of all drugs and of all whisky used in connection with drugs by an express provision of this bill. It would be utterly impracticable for us in legislating upon this subject to attempt to settle the controversy that has existed, and perhaps always will exist, between what is known as the "manufacturers of straight whisky" and the "concoctors of blended and rectified whiskies." The committee tried to avoid that controversy. It is no part of our duty in legislating upon this question to settle these controversies any more than it would be to settle the question as to the superiority of any other article of food or commerce.

These contending schools of distillers, or, rather, the distillers and those who take the product of the still and change it into something else, have always existed, and they probably always will, but I had hoped that their contentions would not be brought into the Senate in the discussion of this bill.

The word "added" has nothing to do with that question, unless the rectifiers or blenders confess that they desire to add fusel oil to their blended whiskies, because when whisky is blended it contains none, if it is a genuine blend based upon cologne spirits. If it is not, then it is a fraud, and this bill is directed against frauds. That is what it is for; and if anyone complains that it interferes with his fraudulent business he complains against the legislation and the purpose for which it is proposed generally. We have no reply to make to that, except to say that we are here to legislate against that class of business.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish simply to address a remark to the Senator from Pennsylvania. It may be that he takes a little different view of the object of this particular section, but I think the Senator's own argument answers the query he made of the Senator from Idaho.

I understand that there is no rectifying of these liquors to such an extent but what there may be some trace of fusel oil left, and if there is any trace of it left it is poisonous. We did not wish to brand these goods as fraudulent simply because they may contain some trace of what any chemist might say is poisonous. That is true of beer. I believe that we manufacture in this country the purest beers that are manufactured upon the face of the earth; and the fact that the brewers' associations are all in favor of this pure-food bill evidences the fact that they are satisfied that they manufacture a pure article; but some chemist may say that in some of the articles used, in the barley that is used, there is something that is poisonous—fusel oil or something of that character in the barley itself, or some trace of it. They might find something in the hops that is poisonous, and if there should be a trace of it, they might, when the case comes up before a court, say that the law provides against liquors containing any poison.

I myself believe that every character of intoxicating liquors contains poison to some extent, and that it is impossible to entirely eradicate that poison from the liquor itself. Therefore it was intended in this provision to protect those people who made as pure an article as they could make against any assumption that a mere trace of poison could put a ban upon their product; and accordingly it was necessary that there should be something "added" other than that which is inherent and must to a certain extent be inherent in the liquor itself. Taking that view of it, it seems to me that the word "added" is necessary to protect the honest producer or manufacturer of these liquors, and that object will not be accomplished if you strike out the word "added," so that it will read:

In the case of liquors, an article shall be deemed adulterated if it contain any ingredient of a poisonous or deleterious character.

Think of that! Liquors shall be deemed adulterated if they contain any ingredient of a deleterious character, as well as of a poisonous character. All liquor is deleterious. I think there will be a general consensus of opinion in that, especially if used in excessive quantities. And yet you will allow a court to convict a dealer by merely finding that the liquor, apparently purified as well as it could be, was still deleterious. Under this provision the deleterious or poisonous ingredient must be something that is added. What is it intended to reach? The fusel oils that are injected into it, the poisonous coloring matters that go into it, such as coal-tar dyes and other poisonous and deleterious articles that are used by the manufacturers, as I understand.

We thought, Mr. President, that we were protecting in this bill the producer of the pure straight whisky, and it seems to me, when you take away that word "added," you are taking away the only protection that they have.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator has very candidly said——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator has been very candid in that last statement. This bill is calculated to protect the producer of what is known as "straight whisky," and to drive out of business or injure the business of the manufacturer of what is known as "the blended product." Whether intentionally or not, he has disclosed what is either the deliberate purpose or the practical effect of the wording of this bill. In other words, the committee reports this bill and endeavors to defend the proposition that fusel oil when added is injurious, but when inherent in the straight whisky, even if it be in much greater quantities, it shall pass uncriticised, unexamined, and unpunished, and be permitted to be sold all over the country, except in so far as it may run counter to the blanket provision existing somewhere in this measure.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the word "added" is not directed alone to fusel oil; it is directed against a large number of ingredients that are used in violation of common honesty in the concoction of mixtures called "whisky" by the vatting process.

Mr. PENROSE. Can not those impurities be reached under the words "if it contain any ingredient of a poisonous nature," without the word "added?" If those blended whiskies "contain" these impurities, that would be sufficient without having the word "added." The word "contain" would be adequate. Then you would reach the straight whisky and the blended whisky; but the word "added" is specifically directed against the manufacturer of the blended article. I ask the Senator whether the word "contain" alone would not reach the added impurities as well as the inherent impurities?

Mr. HEYBURN. I reply to that in this way, that an analysis of nearly every class or character of what is termed "liquor"—and I include wines and beers—will show the presence of some organic poison. An analysis of nearly all of them, in their natural condition, will show the presence of poison, whether it comes from the grain from which the product is manufactured or from the fruit or the grapes, or whatever it may be. Upon analysis some part of those products—the rind, the flesh, the seeds, or some part of it—will show the presence of poison; like the pit of the peach, like the seed of a grape, for instance. That poison belongs there; nature puts it there, and we can not undertake to compel the manufacturer of any product from those original substances to extract nature's deposit of poison. We have to tolerate that, because every day in the year we consume more or less of nature's admixture of ingredients that if extracted would be poisonous, but if remaining in the association that nature has provided are not poisonous.

There are a great many poisons contained in foods in their natural condition that if extracted and taken alone would destroy life, but if taken in connection with nature's organization are harmless. Those foods are well known. Take grain. The hull of the wheat or barley results upon fermentation in the production of fusel oil. It is nature's composition. It is not a healthful thing to take into the human system, and if you were to extract the quantity of fusel oil contained in the quantity of liquor which a man might safely consume and allow him to take it as an independent product it would kill him, because its character is changed and envenomed by a separation from the combination that nature placed it in.

This bill, in using the word "added," in line 8, page 11, was intended to go no further in the threat against the health of human beings than was absolutely necessary under the law of nature in the consumption of nature's products. That is the principle upon which the word "added" is used.

A rectifier of whisky may be either a comparatively innocent person or a very vicious and dangerous person, because the word "rectify" means anything. You may give it any meaning or any limitation that you want. It may consist simply in taking whisky and coloring it or sweetening it in a harmless way. That would be rectifying within the meaning of the word. Or you may take whisky and you may add tobacco juice to it, you may add fusel oil to it, you may add coal-tar dyes to it, and you are still rectifying it. The question is, Where are you going to stop? It is intended here that the rectifier shall be kept within the limits prescribed in this definition and in the paragraph following—to say how far he may go in adding other substances to nature's comparatively harmless substances—if whisky is a harmless substance.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. There is a standard in this bill for drugs. Is there any standard in this bill for whisky?

Mr. HEYBURN. There is a standard in this bill for whisky when used in connection with drugs.

Mr. SPOONER. That is a part of the standard; that enters into the Pharmacopœia standard.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes, sir.

Mr. SPOONER. But I am talking about whisky for potable purposes.

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there any whisky of which it can be said that it does not contain ingredients of a deleterious character? New whisky contains more fusel oil than does old whisky. In the old whisky it is transformed into ether, I believe. But either is deleterious. Is not this clause practically a prohibition? In other words, what I want to get at is whether standards are not absolutely necessary somewhere to the understanding and administration of this bill when enacted into law?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will answer the question. Standards would be necessary if whisky were a new product which was just being introduced into commerce and into use and we were unfamiliar with it and its effects. But whisky has obtained, through the long years of its use by individuals and its place in commerce, a recognized standard. The process of making whisky is one that has become recognized within fixed lines and limits. A certain quantity of grain and a certain process produce whisky of a commercial standard, and the courts have been engaged for the last fifty years, since we have had revenue laws, in determining what constituted a standard of pure whisky, and it has been reduced to a legal certainty. Whisky that is dropped from the still in a natural condition, has gone through a certain process, etc., the courts have held is whisky, and pure whisky.

Mr. SPOONER. If there be a standard, why strike out the word "added?"

Mr. HEYBURN. The word "added" it is intended shall remain.

Mr. McCUMBER. We do not want to strike it out.

Mr. HEYBURN. We do not want to strike it out. We are opposing its being stricken out.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. I wanted the Senator from Idaho to yield to me for the purpose of asking both the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Pennsylvania whether it is necessary for the blender of whisky to have permission to add a poisonous or deleterious substance? Does the blender depend upon that; and is it necessary to exclude from the bill a provision that he can not add a poisonous or deleterious substance?

Mr. SPOONER. I know nothing about the blending of whisky. The Senator does not want to strike out the word "added," and I am very greatly in doubt whether it should be stricken out. I am not antagonizing at all the position of the Senator. But added to what? That implies that there is a recognized standard.

Mr. HEYBURN. Added to the liquor. I have just stated that it has been determined through long years of experience what constitutes liquor. The courts have determined that wine is a product, uncontaminated, extracted by a certain process. The courts, in the interpretation of our revenue laws, have defined whisky as being the distillation from certain grains uncontaminated or unadulterated by any other process or substance.

Mr. SPOONER. Is there not a standard of whisky in the Pharmacopœia?

Mr. HEYBURN. There is a standard in the revenue laws.

Mr. SPOONER. Why not refer to some standard?

Mr. HEYBURN. We do not need to refer to existing conditions. The courts will take cognizance of them.

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that this paragraph, beginning on page 11, line 11, does not say "whisky." It says "liquors," and "liquors" embraces almost anything you drink having any alcohol in it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have just called the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to it. It covers all liquors.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator undertook to say that there was a distinct characterization, settled by long series of decisions of the courts, as to what constitutes whisky, and then he turns around and says liquor is whisky. Whisky is liquor, but all liquors are not necessarily whisky.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator misunderstood me. I said that liquors included wine, beer, whisky, and all drinks of that kind. I particularly said so in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think the Senator from Wisconsin catches the point as to striking out the word "added." If that word is stricken out, it is equivalent to a prohibition of the sale of any liquors.

Mr. SPOONER. So it looks to me.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is exactly what it means, because there is no court on the face of the earth that would not hold that liquor is deleterious in itself. Therefore we put in the word. It applies simply to added deleterious substances.

Mr. SPOONER. So it seemed to me, but when the word "added" is used, naturally the question arose in my mind, Added to what?

Mr. HEYBURN. To the liquor. The first words are "in the case of liquors."

Mr. McCUMBER. While there may not be a standard, for instance, there may be less alcohol in corn whisky than in rye whisky. There may be a difference. I do not pretend to know. But I do not think there is any settled standard except it must be the pure product, as stated by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. SPOONER. I can understand how the word "added" works out easily as to a single article—something not inherent in the thing itself being added to it. There is a standard which is erected by nature, and it is easily susceptible of right construction and administration.

Mr. BACON. I wish to suggest to Senators that if they would not get so close together in a group others in the Chamber would get the benefit of the debate.

Mr. SPOONER. I assure the Senator he is losing nothing, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BACON. What did the Senator remark?

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is losing nothing.

Mr. BACON. I will not take that for granted.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin construe this as meaning added to anything not inherent in the article?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know. This covers the whole range of liquors. It covers whisky. It covers everything the courts have held to be intoxicating drinks, I suppose.

Mr. McCUMBER. It now reads in this way:

> In the case of liquors an article shall be deemed adulterated if it contain any ingredient of a poisonous or deleterious character.

Suppose we add:

> Not inherent in the article itself.

Does that improve it?

Mr. SPOONER. In the case of drugs——

Mr. HEYBURN. This is confined to liquors.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well. That is better.

Mr. McCUMBER. A drug is a compound.

Mr. SPOONER. You used the word "added" there.

Mr. HEYBURN. I wish the Senator from Wisconsin would call my attention to any point where we have used the word "added" in reference to drugs.

Mr. SPOONER. I will. I do not know whether the amendment suggested by the Senator from North Dakota will be right or not.

Mr. McCUMBER. I gave it the same construction without those words as with them—that it relates to a thing that is not inherent in the product itself.

Mr. FORAKER. Does not the Pharmacopœia fix a standard for whisky——

Mr. GALLINGER. It does.

Mr. FORAKER. As to the amount of fusel oil that may be in it without being deleterious? I was going to suggest that if it did, why would it not cure the trouble to say "added to the standard prescribed by the Pharmacopœia?"

Mr. HEYBURN. The reason is that in our revenue laws we have a different standard.

Mr. FORAKER. I accept the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. The grade of whisky is different when it goes into bond from what it is when it comes out of bond.

Mr. SPOONER. It seems that we have one standard established by custom and acknowledged by this bill, and that there are different standards for whisky. Now, "added" to which?

Mr. HEYBURN. To any standard.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, that will not do.

Mr. HEYBURN. For instance, whisky one year old has one standard, and if you add to that whisky you make it more vicious. Whisky seven years old has a higher standard, and if you add to that you make it more vicious. It is intended that each of these standards shall retain its status; that it shall not be tampered with.

Mr. SPOONER. Are these standards arranged with reference to the age of the whisky?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Pharmacopœia deals with whisky as a medicine. The revenue laws deal with it as a beverage.

Mr. SPOONER. Do the revenue laws deal with whisky with reference to its age?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. The bonded-warehouse provision will enlighten us upon that question.

Mr. SPOONER. Why not refer to that standard in this section?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is a law. We do not need, in passing bills, to refer to or reenact previous laws. They are fixed standards. We take notice of them in legislating.

Mr. SPOONER. If I may be permitted, the Senator refers in the bill to the Pharmacopœia.

Mr. HEYBURN. Only in connection with drugs.

Mr. SPOONER. In connection with drugs and liquors.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to have the Senator call my attention——

Mr. SPOONER. I think so.

Mr. HEYBURN. To any place where we refer to it in connection with liquors.

Mr. SPOONER. Perhaps I am mistaken about that.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me that with the word "added" in there the difficulty is this: The liquor could be filled with any amount of poisonous substances if it is in the original manufacture, and you can not get at it, because the substance has to be "added" in order to come within the condemnation of this proposed law.

Mr. HEYBURN. That comes under another provision.

Mr. LODGE. It seems to me the language proposed by the Senator from North Dakota just now is very much better. I think as it is now it is a very risky arrangement of words, a very dangerous one, and may lead to some of the abuses which this bill, it is hoped, will destroy.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly; the words suggested by the Senator from North Dakota are better if there is a standard. I was not aware that there is a standard.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, may I say a word? I think the revenue standard is a bare standard of alcohol. It does not include anything else.

Mr. LODGE. The mere question of proof.

Mr. ALLISON. The mere question of proof. It provides that alcohol at 200 proof, or whatever it may be, is pure alcohol. Then comes distilled spirits, which run lower in proof, and the tax is paid on the basis of pure alcohol, but according to the proof strength of the particular article. That I understand to be the standard of the revenue laws, and no other.

Mr. HEYBURN. They have to attain a certain degree of purity before they are taken out of bond. That carries with it the result of nature's action on those liquors when they are kept in wood.

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly allowance is made for evaporation, etc., during the years the liquor is in bond, but it is not touched in any way. It is impossible to put into the whisky in a bonded warehouse any added substance, poisonous or otherwise.

Mr. HEYBURN. You do not have to touch whisky to get rid of the fusel oil. Nature will get rid of it under certain circumstances.

Mr. ALLISON. So I understand; and that is done in the bonded warehouse by means of the ordinary operation of light, heat, etc. The only standard I know of in the internal-revenue law is a standard as respects the alcoholic contents.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but it carries with it as a necessary sequence the other proposition.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes; what nature does during the time the whisky is in the bonded warehouse in wood.

Mr. HEYBURN. The aging process.

Mr. ALLISON. But there is nothing added.

Mr. HEYBURN. There are various processes.

Mr. ALLISON. There is nothing added in the warehouse.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire on what ground any Senator will contend for the right of anybody to add a poisonous or deleterious substance to anything—from a barrel of apples up to a barrel of whisky. On what ground is it contended that he has such a right?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know of anybody who does so contend.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then what objection can there be to saying that it can not be done?

Mr. SPOONER. I am not objecting to it.

Mr. LODGE. My objection is that the Senator allows a man to put it in the original manufacture, and punishes the man who adds it. I want to reach them both.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator does not correctly state the proposition when he says the bill—I suppose he means "the bill" when he says "the Senator"—allows a man to put it in. It does not. If nature has placed it there, it is one thing. But he shall go no further than nature has gone in the matter. He shall not add.

Mr. LODGE. The bill confines it to the men who add. Now, in all the range of liquors, a man who makes a liquor with poisonous ingredients, provided it is an original manufacture, is not reached by the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. He is by the next section.

Mr. LODGE. I do not think he is reached at all. I think he is excluded. The man who sells perfectly new whisky of the rawest and most poisonous kind, goes scot-free, while the blender is knocked out of business.

Mr. HEYBURN. It does not affect the blender.

Mr. LODGE. It affects nobody else but the blender.

Mr. HEYBURN. The blending of whisky is merely the admixture of one whisky with another.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me one word more, I will not interrupt him further. The practical effect of that clause as it stands, it seems to me, is to put the blender out of business and to throw the business into the hands of the original maker.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HEYBURN. In a moment. Does the Senator from Massachusetts understand that the blender adds poisonous and deleterious substances to liquor?

Mr. LODGE. Not necessarily.

Mr. HEYBURN. Does he ever do it?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know. I suppose he does.

Mr. HEYBURN. If he does, should he be permitted to do it?

Mr. LODGE. He should not.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, why object to a provision that prevents him from doing it?

Mr. LODGE. I do not object. I object to confining it to one class of makers.

Mr. McCUMBER. I think we can settle the difficulty by an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair wishes to call the attention of Senators to the fact that the debate is proceeding under the ten-minute rule, and it is very difficult for the Chair to determine the matter of time.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I wish to have an opportunity to answer the Senator from Idaho, and my answer is precisely similar to that of the Senator from Massachusetts.

I do not defend the addition of poisonous ingredients, but I complain of discrimination. The constituents whom I represent in this matter are some of the most substantial people in the country in the manufacture of these products, and a large percentage of the blended whiskies, I understand, are made in Pennsylvania and Maryland. The deliberate purpose or the practical effect of the pending bill is to discriminate against them in favor of the manufacturer of what is known as the "straight whisky product." He is to be permitted to sell his goods all over the country, no matter what excess of fusel oil may be found therein or what other inherent and poisonous impurities there may be in it, while the blended-whisky manufacturer is prejudiced in the public eye and discriminated against by being singled out in this provision.

There is no charge, as I understand, that the manufacturers of these old-established blends are guilty of any adulteration or the addition of any impurities. Some of these blended products in Pennsylvania are over one hundred years old. In many cases the same family has been engaged in the manufacture of the product for nearly one hundred years or more. The blends have a national reputation and have a large commercial value, running up to several hundred thousand dollars for the possession and control of their secret processes. They rank among the purest of all whiskies, and yet this bill deliberately singles them out and attacks these many million dollars of invested capital and these reputable gentlemen by a phraseology which is calculated to promote the sale of the straight-whisky product while at the same time harassing and singling out the blended-whisky manufacturer.

If this committee will be just to itself and will be consistent and will devise some phraseology that will include all products of whisky, I will not complain. But I do complain, and I think I am entitled to complain, of the discrimination.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to have the Senator from Pennsylvania state how this bill or this provision in any wise interferes with the honest blending of whisky or any other liquors by any of the manufacturers who he says will be wiped out of existence.

Mr. PENROSE. It does it in this way: It makes the bill apply only to the blended-whisky manufacturer, while it permits his competitor in the whisky market—the straight-whisky manufacturer—to sell all the poisonous product that he has an opportunity to sell in competition with the manufacturer of blended whisky.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the Senator hardly answers——

Mr. PENROSE. I will endeavor to answer as nearly as I can.

Mr. McCUMBER. Admitting now that there is something in the contention of the Senator, that this bill does not exclude from the market the "raw whiskies," as they are called, even though all the poisonous materials are not taken out, in what way does it injure the manufacturer or the blender of pure whisky using only pure articles? How does the word "added" interfere with any article or the use of any article by the blender which is pure and which is justifiable?

Mr. PENROSE. It does not interfere with any of the great concerns in Pennsylvania engaged in the manufacture of this product. There is no charge and there is no suspicion that their product is impure in any degree. They are as zealous for the enactment of pure-food legislation as is the Senator from North Dakota or the Senator from Idaho; and I will not yield in my zeal for legislation in this matter to any Senator upon this floor. But I do think it is an obvious and practical proposition that no one particular product should be singled out and a product of a similar character should be permitted to go untrammeled and uncontrolled. If the Senators having this bill in charge will make it apply to all forms of whisky, I will not complain.

My constituents are as anxious as he is to have nothing but a pure whisky on the market, but they do object to a provision worded, either cunningly or inadvertently, so as to permit the manufacturer of straight whisky to put upon the American public his poisonous compound, while the manufacturers of the blended article alone are singled out to come within the provisions of this bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. There can hardly be a "poisonous compound" of the straight whisky.

Mr. PENROSE. I used the word inadvertently.

Mr. McCUMBER. The moment it becomes a compound it becomes a blended or rectified whisky.

Mr. PENROSE. I used the word inadvertently. I simply maintain, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] does, that under the provisions of this bill the manufacturer of straight whisky is permitted to sell a poisonous product, containing an amount of fusel oil far in excess of the standard of the American Pharmacopœia, a standard which I understand is such that I know in Philadelphia no hospital uses any whisky as a medicine unless it is of the standard of the American Pharmacopœia. It permits the manufacturer of the straight-whisky product, even if it contains an amount of fusel oil far in excess of that standard, to sell it.

Mr. GALLINGER. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. PENROSE. Certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. The American Pharmacopœia requires that whisky shall be 4 years old.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes.

Mr. GALLINGER. That provision was made, I suppose, with a view of taking from the whisky the fusel oil that is in it when it is first manufactured.

Mr. PENROSE. Yes, sir. In other words, the manufacturer of blended whisky is prohibited from selling his article if it contains an excessive amount of fusel oil, while the manufacturer of the straight product can sell all the whisky he desires untrammeled by this bill—whisky containing a much larger amount of fusel oil—simply because the fusel oil is inherent and is not added.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator's argument certainly refutes itself, because if this bill allows the use of straight whisky or liquors which contain an excessive amount of fusel oil, then the blender can use those straight whiskies containing those extra amounts. In other words, he can take straight whisky and he can mix as many brands as he sees fit in order to get the proper flavoring or the proper coloring, and yet he would not be amenable to the proposed law under the construction given to it by the Senator from Pennsylvania. I think I make myself clear.

Mr. PENROSE. The Senator does not make himself clear to me. I do not know how it is as to the rest of the Senate.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will try to make myself clear. If a manufacturer of straight whisky containing fusel oil under the bill can place it upon the market, which the Senator from Pennsylvania says he can, then the manufacturer of blended whisky can purchase that same straight whisky containing the extra amount of fusel oil and he can blend it. He, in that case, is adding nothing that is poisonous. He is simply taking the article as it comes to him and blending two poisonous articles.

Now, I want to say to the Senator and to all Senators that I am just as anxious as anyone else that if we are bound to have whiskies and these liquors in the United States we should require them to be as pure as it is possible for us to require them to be. I do not want a law that will allow the maker of a raw whisky to sell a poisonous article and the blender of those same raw whiskies to be amenable to a criminal prosecution if he sells the same.

Mr. President, this bill is not open to that objection. It may be open to the other objection—that we have not sufficiently guarded the character of whiskies that may be sold. In answer to that, I can but reiterate what has been said by the Senator from Idaho. The committee felt that it did not wish to go into the question of making standards; that all it would require was that the products that are now being sold in the United States should not be sold in a way that would become fraudulent in any way. There may be a dozen standards. I do not know that rye whisky or corn whisky or potato whisky would all measure up to the same standard; and unless I would have more information than I now have on the subject I would be opposed to Congress fixing a commercial standard for anything. When we have gone so far, Mr. President, that we protect the public against imposition and against added poisons, it seems to me that we have gone just as far as we can.

If this character of amendment would meet the objection that is urged by the Senator from Ohio, or the Senator from Wisconsin, or the Senator from Pennsylvania, suppose we should amend the provision by inserting, in line 7, page 11, so as to read as follows:

In the case of liquors an article shall be deemed adulterated if it contains any added ingredient of a poisonous or deleterious character not inherent in such liquor.

And we might add:

Or capable of elimination therefrom.

The latter portion would probably compel the distillers to eliminate as much as possible the fusel oil from their product before they put it on the market. But I am not sufficiently versed upon that subject, and I do not know how far-reaching it would be, to justify me at the present time in demanding any such standard. If, after we get better informed of the operation of this law, we deem that it is best to make a standard we can do so, but we have avoided it, and I think we have kept on the safe side in doing that.

Mr. PENROSE. Mr. President, I would not think that amendment would be satisfactory. It does not seem like good sense to say "if it contains any added ingredients of a poisonous or deleterious character not inherent in the liquor." The word "added" shows that it is not inherent. It does not seem to me to be a logical proposition.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not necessarily so, because the liquor might contain a trace of fusel oil, and yet to give it, as they say, that fine nutty flavor they might add more fusel oil to it. That would not be inherent in the article itself.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, one would imagine, listening to us here, that we had been out and taken some of this liquor or whisky that we are discussing so luminously, or rather so muddily, because the further we go the less we understand it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I defer to the good judgment of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not claim any superior knowledge, but I do claim to know a little something. The whole trouble here is because you use the broad term "liquor" and immediately turn around and define that by the word "whisky," whereas whisky is one thing and liquor is applicable to all things that have alcoholic ingredients in them.

Unless you come down to some definite standard and basis or description to know what you are trying to provide against, and then leave it to the officers to say which is the true thing and which is the adulterated thing, you will just have a mess of lawsuits and give an opportunity for a tyrannical exhibition of power by the officer in charge of the business, and room for favoritism.

Now, I will try to make myself understood again. Whisky is the product of the distillation of grain usually. Of course they make it out of potatoes and other things, but whisky is the product of the distillation of grain after a certain fermentation and not carried beyond a certain point. In other words, you will never have a product coming from the worm more than 60 per cent alcohol. It never goes more than 3½ gallons to the bushel, and if it is made in a copper still it is better than if made in any other metal.

Now, that whisky is put in the warehouse, and a stamp is put on it showing the strength. They reduce it to 50 per cent proof, the Government standard, by the addition of distilled water. It is kept in the control of the Government until the tax is paid, when the fact is burned into the barrel by a stamp or another paper stamp put on, making two stamps, and it goes out into commerce. That is whisky.

But that sort of whisky is not the usual product sold on the market by the rectifiers. They manufacture their stuff out of spirits, which is alcohol, either cologne spirits, deodorized alcohol, or crude spirits alcohol with the fusel oil left in.

The bulk of the fine whiskies—practically all, I will state, of the "blended whiskies," so called—are made from pure cologne spirits, and two-stamp whisky, which has been aged, added to it, and with such harmless ingredients as prune juice, burnt caramels or sugar, and something of that type, which will give it a smoothness and make it appetizing.

The two-stamp liquor gives the fusel oil, in its transformed shape of ether, to furnish flavor; but the bulk of the common whiskies, millions of gallons of 1 X and 2 X rectified whisky, is made from crude alcohol without the fusel oil being taken out of it, and not a gallon of straight whisky enters into its manufacture. It is made of the cheapest form of alcohol, and the "added" ingredients, coloring matter to take the white off and put brown on, and the bead oil to make it have the appearance of whisky, and other things which are more or less harmful. It is to guard against such adulterated stuff that the word "added" is incorporated here.

If you say two-stamp whisky or straight whisky the bonded warehouse people will understand what you mean. But when you say liquors, you embrace the whole family, and you open the door wide, because you leave the rectifier free to add anything he pleases to the stuff, wood alcohol included, and foist it off on the consumer.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, it took the Senator from South Carolina very much longer to learn what he knows about liquor than it has taken him to deliver this lecture upon the subject to his class.

Mr. TILLMAN. I was about three weeks studying it very religiously.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator had experience in it, of course, as the governor of his State. They tried the experiment of a dispensary law, and it was necessary for him to know something about it.

I listened to the Senator with great care, and I think I know as much about it nearly as I did before; and I say that with the greatest possible respect to the Senator's knowledge and clearness of speech. But it is a complicated subject.

Mr. TILLMAN. It is very complicated, I acknowledge.

Mr. SPOONER. It is a complicated subject. The Senator is absolutely right, I think, that with the word "added," or an equivalent word stricken from this clause, it would be infinitely worse than no provision in the act at all upon the subject.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is what the committee think.

Mr. SPOONER. The answer made by the Senator from Pennsylvania to the question put to him by the Senator from North Dakota, which was a crucial question, illustrates, perhaps, the unfairness of the whole provision, but it constitutes no argument on behalf of the blenders in favor of striking out the word "added."

A man has strictly no right to say that he should be permitted to sell to the public poisonous food or poisonous articles until the Congress enacts a law which prohibits everybody else from doing the same thing. I do not know whether a provision can be drawn which will limit the sale as to straight whisky; but straight whisky is not adulterated, although it may be so manufactured, I take it, having in it only its natural ingredients, and that, too, perhaps, in larger quantity in one case than another, as to be extremely deleterious. Whether that can be reached I do not know.

But, Mr. President, I want just a moment, in calling the attention of the Senator from Idaho and also the Senator from North Dakota, to say that I do not understand how Senators can expect to make this bill, when it shall have been enacted, a valuable law or capable of successful administration if they fight shy, as they seem to have done, of anything which looks like establishing standards. They have established a standard as to drugs. That is the Pharmacopœia.

Mr. HEYBURN. We have adopted one.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, you have adopted one, which for the purposes of this bill establishes one. It is law after this bill shall have passed, because it is enacted into law. Without this bill it would not be law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. It has been the law by reason of the fact that the courts in determining cases involving that question have always held that the American Pharmacopœia was the standard upon which their judgment was based. That is as old as that publication.

Mr. SPOONER. Yet a man who sells anything now in the way of a drug which is not in harmony with the standard of the Pharmacopœia commits an offense under this bill. Without this bill he would not, except under the laws of the States. So the Senator is mistaken if he supposes that the adoption of a Pharmacopœia standard as to drugs has no added significance by being in this bill.

Going back to the question of standards, I can not understand the argument upon which the Senators insist that all standards shall be excluded. As to an article in its natural condition, taking opium, strychnine, or arsenic, I can understand what function the word "added" would perform as to that poison. But where it is a compound—arsenic and opium, or arsenic and strychnine, to illustrate—I do not see what the word "added" is to mean, because there is no standard. You can not use the word "inherent." The applicability of that word is destroyed when you compound two things. While it is sensible applied to either, it is not susceptible of sensible or practical construction when applied to both.

Now, the Senator from Idaho said—and I do not refer to it except to call his attention to the point I make—that section 4 does not use the word "added," as I understood him.

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not have my attention directed to it.

Mr. SPOONER. That is not what I am speaking about. It provides—

> That the examinations of specimens of foods, drugs, medicines, and liquors shall be made in the Bureau of Chemistry of the Department of Agriculture, or under the direction and supervision of such Bureau, for the purpose of determining from such examinations whether such article is adulterated or misbranded, or contains any poisonous or other substance deleterious to the health of human beings or domestic animals; "and if it shall appear from any such examination that such specimens are adulterated or misbranded or contain any added poisonous or deleterious substance or ingredient injurious to human health when used in the prescribed or usual manner of use of such article," the Secretary of Agriculture shall cause notice thereof, etc.

Now, applied to a compound, what does the word "added" mean?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I will answer the question.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well.

Mr. HEYBURN. For instance, suppose in flour 25 per cent of white clay is used; that would be an added deleterious ingredient. It is not a healthful thing for the human system to take in 25 per cent of white clay.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly; that is easy. That falls within my definition or statement of a moment ago. When a thing is in its natural condition, anything put with it, mixed with it, is added to it; but where the article is composed of two things commingled, each different from the other, it can not be said to be in a natural condition. Man for some purposes has blended the two, and when you use the word "added" as predicated upon that compound, it does not mean practically as well as in law the same thing that it means when predicated upon the thing in its natural condition.

Mr. HEYBURN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly; I have no purpose except to get at the right of things.

Mr. HEYBURN. This is section 4, line 23: "any added poisonous or deleterious substance."

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, on what ground can the Senator defend or claim the right to add a poisonous or deleterious substance?

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator can not be permitted to put me in the position of defending the right of anybody in this country or anywhere else to add a poison.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then I would ask what this bill does? I did not intend the question to be personal to the Senator.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not offended; the Senator misapprehends me. If I am right about it, the bill, wherever the word "added" is used, needs amendment in order to make it workable. I support the Senator's proposition or an equivalent word in connection with blended liquors. I support the proposition that the word "added" or some better word more accurately expressing the thought shall be added in section 4. I am not willing that the blended-liquor men should be permitted to add to straight whisky poisonous or deleterious ingredients.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. In the given case where the word "added" is used, it is limited by the words "poisonous or deleterious." It is limited by those words.

Mr. SPOONER. That does not touch the point. Added to what?

Mr. HEYBURN. Added to the substance, whatever it be.

Mr. SPOONER. But suppose it is a compound. For instance, strychnine in its natural condition, if you please, is strychnine, and nothing else. Now, it is easy to say that if anything is added to that of a dangerous character it shall be deemed adulterated. But suppose a person has commingled strychnine and arsenic, if they may be combined in a drug or some article. When you say added to that deleterious ingredients, added to what? Not added to something that was inherent, because the two things commingled destroy all that is meant by the word "inherent" when applied to either one.

All I mean, Mr. President, and all this comes to, if it comes anywhere, is that there must be standards and that there must be somewhere authority to establish standards, or there is the gravest possible danger that the bill, full of penalties, full of possible misconstructions, will prove unworkable.

Mr. President, public opinion has taken great strides in the States in perfecting pure-food laws and in administering with very great efficiency pure-food laws. I think there is no State in the country to-day in which pure-food laws are more efficiently administered than in Wisconsin. Other States have taken very great interest in it. It is so with Minnesota; it is so with the Dakotas. But when this Federal law shall have been passed, the danger is that there will be so great reliance in the accuracy and fidelity and administration of the Federal machinery in keeping out of the States all misbranded and adulterated foods, poisons, and the like as to weaken the administration of the State laws.

The necessity for standards has been recognized by Congress heretofore. For the last five years in every agricultural appropriation act there has been an appropriation made containing this language:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the character of food preservatives, coloring matters, and other substances added to foods, to determine their relation to digestion and to health, and to establish the principles which should guide their use; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the character of the chemical and physical tests which are applied to American food products in foreign countries—

Learning more as to what should constitute a standard—and to inspect before shipment, when desired by the shippers or owners of these food products, American food products intended for countries where chemical and physical tests are required before said food products are allowed to be sold in the countries mentioned, and for all necessary expenses connected with such inspection and studies of methods of analysis in foreign countries; to enable the Secretary of Agriculture, in collaboration with the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists—

Whatever that is—

and such other experts as he may deem necessary, to establish standards of purity for food products and to determine what are regarded as adulterations therein.

In every act but the last one that was added for the guidance of the officials of the various States and of the courts of justice. It was omitted in the last appropriation act.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me just to finish this sentence. There have been established standards under this law by the Agricultural Department or its Bureau of Chemistry. There have been by the national association of State food officials established standards of food products. I am told that in some respects they are not in harmony.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me——

Mr. SPOONER. Very well.

Mr. HEYBURN. The standards to which the Senator refers and the legislation to which he refers are purely educational. The violation of them is not enforced by any penalty. They are simply laws for the assistance in the way of education of the State pure-food bureaus, that is all, and there is no provision for punishing anyone for violating the rule of the standard. Now, we are seeking to pass a law for protection, not for education.

Mr. SPOONER. Ah, the Senator misses the point. Of course I am obliged to admit (and I am not attacking the bill at all) that there are no penalties connected with this legislation, but the power is given to this Bureau of Chemistry, the same Bureau exactly to which is committed all the power under this bill, to establish food standards.

Mr. HEYBURN. But not to enforce them.

Mr. SPOONER. This bill does not propose to enforce them.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; it proposes to enforce a conformity to the standards that are prescribed in general terms, and not specific standards as to each article.

Mr. SPOONER. But, Mr. President, that is just the point. There is no power in the bill for the establishment of standards except as to the Pharmacopœia.

Mr. HEYBURN. When the Senator has reached a point where he can yield I will answer that proposition.

Mr. SPOONER. I yield to the Senator now.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Idaho allow me?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, without some yardstick by which to measure the degree of criminality as shown by the adulteration, I would feel unwilling to trust to the Bureau of Chemistry of the Agricultural Department, or any other bureau, the promulgation of rules and regulations left to them arbitrarily. If they have been already investigating, as the Senator from Wisconsin has shown, I think they ought to be able to furnish the Senate a simple description of what constitutes a wholesome, healthy article of commerce, such as is commonly sold, and we will lay that down in the law and then say that anything which does not come up to that is adulterated, and punish the persons who make it.

I want to suggest to the Senator something that has occurred to me since this debate began. This bill is too crudely drawn and it is too loose jointed. There is too much power placed here in the hands of a bureau for Congress to enact it, and I am going to move sometime or other—or at least I have a very strong inclination that way—to recommit the bill to the committee in charge to get this exact information which has been sought by the Bureau of Chemistry for the last five years, we furnishing the money. Let the basis of criminal action be laid down in the law and let us not leave it to regulations promulgated by Doctor Wiley or the Secretary of Agriculture or anybody else.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am quite certain if such a thing should occur, and we were to bring in a bill fixing the standards, the Senate would never agree to it. We have avoided fixing standards in this national legislation because——

Mr. TILLMAN rose.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask the Senator just to have patience with me for a moment. He was not here yesterday when we discussed this point. We have avoided fixing standards because nearly every State in the Union has standards of its own, and it would be absolutely impossible to steer clear of a conflict with some of the State standards.

Mr. TILLMAN. Right there, if the Senator will permit me, that is a very queer condition.

Mr. HEYBURN. It exists.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then what difference will it be? As soon as we put this power in the hands of the Secretary of Agriculture or in his subordinates and he fixed standards arbitrarily, with the right to confer with the States, would you not have the same trouble.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator just allow me right there to say he has been reading the wrong print of the bill.

Mr. TILLMAN. I have been reading the print which is on the desks of Senators.

Mr. HEYBURN. The bill does not put the power to fix standards in the hands of any Department or bureau. It specifically does not. The only power that is authorized to fix standards under the bill is vested in the courts of the United States, there, and only there. The Department, against which much has been said, simply collects the testimony. The three Departments of the Government that are especially equipped for this service are authorized to collect the facts and to report their work to the United States attorney, and if in the judgment of the United States attorney those facts are sufficient upon which to base a prosecution, he for the first time puts the machinery of the law in operation. That machinery of the law is the courts of the United States, and the standard will depend upon the interpretation which the judge of the court sitting with a jury shall place upon the act committed.

Now, I have no doubt at all that in administering this law the judge of a United States court in the district from which the Senator from South Carolina comes would conform as nearly as possible to the rule of standards existing in the community, because every man is primarily supposed to govern his conduct by the recognized standard of uprightness and honesty and fairness of the community in which he lives. He is of course subject to the governing force of the law of the country, but locally the courts would enforce this law according to the standard of morals represented by the State law.

In other words, there is a certain rule of interpretation that has always been observed by the courts, and wherever the State law and the national law can be harmonized the courts will endeavor to do so.

The difference between standards is not so wide as to constitute a crime under the laws of one State that would not be a crime under another. The difference is not so great as to result in that unfortunate condition. They differ in detail. For instance, in the State of Washington alcohol must be branded with a mark upon the package showing the percentage of alcohol. It is a criminal offense to vary from that requirement—that is, to sell alcohol below a certain standard. In this District here there is no requirement. When you buy a bottle of alcohol here it does not appear upon the package what the percentage of alcohol is. Other States have an 85 per cent rule, and so on.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Then does the Senator mean to say that under the provisions of this bill a man could be prosecuted in the Federal courts for having sold alcohol contrary to the law of Washington and be convicted there, and he could not be convicted in the District of Columbia or in the State of Virginia, we will say, in order to make it apply to a State, although he sold alcohol under precisely the same circumstances?

Mr. HEYBURN. He can be convicted under the rule that the court shall hold to pertain, and if the court says that, taking the conditions in this country generally into consideration, this alcohol is not up to the standard of purity because it does not conform to the recognized rule—that is, in the absence of a rule——

Mr. BAILEY. As a matter of fact, I understand there is no rule established, according to the Senator, and it is left somewhat to the opinion, or we will say to the conscience, of the judge.

Mr. HEYBURN. It would not be under this proposed law, because it describes of what adulterations shall consist; and if a man took alcohol and put 25 per cent of water into it, I do not think the judge would hesitate to instruct the jury that the alcohol was adulterated.

Mr. BAILEY. I understood the Sentor from Idaho to say that this bill has established no standard, but left the standard to be established by the court upon the trial of the case.

Mr. HEYBURN. Under the general definition, under the statute.

Mr. BAILEY. Under the general definition. But I understood the Senator to illustrate by saying that in the State of Washington there was one requirement as to the sale of alcohol, while no such requirements existed, to use his own instance, in the District of Columbia. I rose to inquire if the Congress was asked to pass a law, a Federal law, which is supposed to be uniform in its operation, under which a citizen could be convicted upon a given state of facts in the State of Washington, but could not be convicted under the same state of facts in the State of Virginia?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will answer that question by inquiring of the Senator what he would do if he were sitting as a judge on the bench in the District of Columbia and a party were charged with selling adulterated alcohol, and it should be shown that it was only 75 per cent alcohol? Would he find any embarrassment in that simply because the statute had not fixed the standard, when it says in terms that the offense shall consist of adding any ingredient which deteriorates the standard of the alcohol?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, judges might differ as to adulteration. For instance, I think the more good water that is put into whisky the less harm it is apt to do; and if I were on the bench I am not perfectly sure, unless I was required by a plain rule of law to convict and imprison a man for putting good water into bad whisky, that I would ever pronounce judgment against him. That is just exactly what I complain of. If the rule is to be as stated by the Senator, this measure of justice is as variable as the judge's conscience, and I will give no judge the right to imprison any man or to fine any man except in accordance with the fixed rule of law.

When it comes to the facts, they, of course, are of infinite variety, but the law ought to be certain. I believe that Blackstone once observed that the certainty of the law is of more importance than the justice of the law, an opinion which I do not myself accept, and yet that so great an authority should have uttered it must give it great weight.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Texas that one of the most valuable attributes of any law is that it shall be certain, or that there shall be the element of certainty in the law—certainty of interpretation, certainty of execution. That represents the highest form of government, an exact measure of a man's right, an exact determination of how far he may go in this direction or in that. This bill is within that rule. This bill is absolutely certain in its definition as to what shall constitute a violation of its provisions. The Senator from Texas knows as well as I do that in the end, recognizing that element and its value, the administration of the law depends in a large measure upon the conscience and intelligence of the judge who presides at the trial and upon the intelligence and conscience of the jury which assists at the trial.

When I made the remark that I did that this proposed law would probably be interpreted within the measure of the spirit of the local statute, I meant that the men who were accustomed to an existing law that was enacted by themselves in their own neighborhood would probably estimate and measure the national law according to that standard. I was not saying that that should be the rule or that under this proposed law there was no other way of proceeding. I was merely commenting on the disposition of human nature as represented by the judges and the juries of the country.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I see that the Senator is seeking to assimilate the rule in civil cases to this criminal procedure. In civil cases the Federal judges are supposed to administer the local law, but not so in criminal cases. There is no crime against the Government of the United States except such as is made so by Federal statute, and I would marvel at a system under which the Federal rule, which is supposed to be one everywhere, should vary according to local conditions.

Now, the Senator from Idaho must know that down in North Carolina—with the pardon of my friend from that State—it is not supposed to be a very grievous sin against God or a crime against the Government to make moonshine whisky. Surely the Senator would not be willing to see a Federal judge sitting in the State of North Carolina adopt the morals of the moonshine mountaineer. In the mountain district of the good old State of Kentucky, many people there—and good people in their way, too—believe that the Federal Government has no right to impose upon them a tax for making out of their own corn what pleases their own spirits; and it never has been possible to thoroughly enforce the law in any of those mountainous districts where illicit distilling is conducted. According to the Senator's theory of this bill when the Federal judge reaches the district where the mountaineers live—who are said always to be free, and it might be added also that they are never very obedient to authority—he shall adopt the code of morals prevailing in that community; and just across the line, down in the blue-grass region, where my distinguished friend from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] lives, and where they always obey the law, he will punish them, while up in the other region, so close to his home, they go scot-free, though guilty of the same offense. That is a new, and, I may be permitted to say, it is a dangerous as well as a novel doctrine.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator's keen faculty for reasoning and drawing deductions has led him far afield from the question out of which this discussion arose. I can readily see how his mind has run along gracefully and glibly to the discussion of a question of that kind, and I would not differ if I had the time to follow him.

I was addressing my remarks when this diversion occurred to the reasons why the committee had not undertaken in this bill to prescribe standards, and I had proceeded so far as to suggest that one of the prime reasons was because of the diversity of State enactments upon these various questions. I suggested, merely in passing, that it might be that the courts would be able to accommodate a general law based upon general rules of interpretation of general application to the local conditions in the States; but I was proceeding to say that each State has a right under the Constitution to regulate business within its own jurisdiction, and if that State, in the wisdom of its legislation, has seen fit to enact a law requiring certain standards in commercial products and business affairs we should not make any law that would enable a manufacturer or a common carrier to deliver within the jurisdiction of the limits of that State any goods or articles that were in contravention of the laws of the State.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. I desire to ask the Senator from Idaho what advantage would there be in the enforcement of this law, so far as liquors are concerned—and I understand that is the matter under discussion—if a standard were established? The introduction of any article containing ingredients of a poisonous or deleterious character is prohibited, it makes no difference what the percentage of alcohol in it may be. It does not seem to me that it makes it any more difficult to enforce the law in the absence of some standard by which you would test the value of the whisky as an article or commodity.

Mr. HEYBURN. I thoroughly agree with the Senator. The establishment of a standard would perform no good office in the administration of this law or in the protection of the people under it. It might be convenient, if no State had a law on the subject establishing standards, for Congress to enter upon that very elaborate performance. I call it "elaborate" because articles of commerce are of infinite variety, and I can imagine no greater undertaking that this body could impose upon itself than that of attempting to sift down the right and at what point we should stop in fixing this standard. Why, the fixing of freight rates is not to be considered for a moment as a gigantic undertaking in comparison.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. FULTON. I wish merely to ask the Senator a question for information. I ask if any of the States have established a standard of purity as to intoxicating beverages of any character?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; many of them.

Mr. FULTON. Do those standards fix the percentage of alcohol?

Mr. HEYBURN. They vary; some of them do, and some do not.

Mr. FULTON. Take blended whiskies, for instance. Are there standards as to blended whiskies?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am unable to answer that question as to whether or not there are standards for blended whisky.

Mr. FULTON. I do not pretend to say that there are not, but it is a difficult problem for me to understand how there could be, for blended whisky is a compound, a mixture, as I understand. I can see that there is some difficulty in the application of that word "added," as suggested a while ago by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], in the case of a compound. It seems to me that there might be language framed that would more clearly carry out and express the idea of the committee and of the friends of the bill than the word "added." I imagine we all know what is meant by that. The idea is that there shall be excluded from this mixture, from the liquor or the straight whisky or from the blended whisky, any poisonous ingredient that does not inhere in some one of its constituents, in some one of the ingredients entering into it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will assist the Senator there by an illustration. You can extract poison from tea or from coffee; you can extract poison from any grain; you can extract poison from many fruits; you can extract poison from the pits of almost any fruit.

Mr. FULTON. I understand that.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is one of the poisons existing in nature's composition.

Mr. FULTON. And yet it may be sold.

Mr. HEYBURN. You can not add to them. You make an ordinary dish of any vegetable that is in common use. The poison is in that vegetable, but not in a poisonous state; it is not an active poison; it is simply a condition out of which a poison can be produced. Now, suppose you would say that because you can extract fusel oil from the grain of your breakfast food that you eat every morning, they should be permitted to add some other poison to it! Suppose you would say if there is poison in it already it can not do much harm to put in more! Suppose commercial cupidity should tempt someone to add to the dormant poison that is in a hundred things that we consume every day, are they to be permitted to do it? This bill says they shall not do it.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. FULTON. I am not hostile to this measure, as the Senator knows. It has no stronger friend than I. I intend to vote for it. I should regret very much were it re-referred, but is it a fact that every ingredient that enters into a compound is added?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but there are words of limitation in the bill.

Mr. FULTON. It may be merely an assembling of certain elements and certain ingredients into one whole.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but there is a limitation on the word "added." It does not prevent you from adding ingredients to combinations or to single substances; it prevents you from adding poisons or deleterious ingredients; that is all. Those are the words of limitation.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I do not desire to interrupt the Senator, but when he is through——

Mr. HEYBURN. I will yield the floor to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, this bill is not an attempt to regulate commerce between the States or with Indian tribes or with foreign nations under any proper definition of that term. It is an attempt, so understood by the authors of it and so understood by the gentlemen who support it, to protect the people of the several States against deceptions in trade and against deleterious articles of food and drink. If it were an attempt in good faith to regulate commerce, there could be no doubt as to the power of the Federal Government over it; but as it is intended, understood, and supported for the purpose of protecting the people of the several States against injurious articles of food and drink, it is purely and only an exercise of the police power, and therefore not within the power of the Federal Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. In the light of that interpretation of the commerce clause of the Constitution, how does the Senator justify the laws that are in force in regard to shipping diseased cattle from one State to another—the quarantine laws?

Mr. BAILEY. I will come to that. The Senator knows that the court originally held the law of Missouri forbidding the shipment of cattle into that State from below the quarantine line invalid. The Senator also knows that the court has very plainly intimated that it was mistaken in the decision reported in 95 United States. It says, in the Kansas case, I believe, involving a regulation of that kind, that the facts were not presented to the court in the Missouri case. It held the law of Missouri invalid because it provided that no cattle from below this quarantine line, or the infected district, should be brought within that State between March and November, we will say. There was no attempt to prove that cattle from below the quarantine line carried with them under all circumstances the fever curse, but after a larger knowledge had been acquired of the conditions which relate to cattle below the quarantine line, and after it had been established that within certain seasons of the year they can not be brought from a tick-infested district into another without communicating disease, then the court very properly stated in the Kansas case that the facts had not been before it in the Missouri case.

The Senator from Idaho knows that the Supreme Court has said more than once that every State in this Union has the inherent, original, and ample power to protect its people against deceptions in trade and against injurious articles of food.

We now and then hear some Senator suggest that the States can not protcet their people against the sale of those injurious articles in the original package. The Senator nods as if he believes that is the law. The Senator from Idaho does not subscribe to that statement of the law, does he?

Mr. President, that arises from the fact that the Senator does not distinguish between the decision of the court in the liquor cases and the decision of the court in the food cases.

In the Plumley case the supreme court of Massachusetts sustained the conviction of a man who had sold oleomargarine manufactured in Illinois and shipped to the State of Massachusetts, where it was sold in the original package. The agent who sold it was indicted under the laws of Massachusetts, convicted in the lower court, and appealed to the supreme court of that State, where the conviction was affirmed. The case was then brought to the Supreme Court of the United States to test the constitutionality of the Massachusetts statute. The Supreme Court of the United States affirmed the judgment of the court below, and held that it was competent for any State in this Union to pass a law prohibiting the sale in the original package of any article injurious to the health of its citizens.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. That was held to be a police regulation?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. HEYBURN. And on that ground.

Mr. BAILEY. That is precisely what you are providing for in your bill here.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will permit the interruption, in this bill we have provided the line of contact at the unbroken package, the jurisdiction of the Government existing so long as goods remain in the unbroken package, and the jurisdiction of the State recognized over it immediately when the package is broken. This bill provides for that.

Mr. BAILEY. The State does not need that provision, because the State has full jurisdiction over it before the package is broken without this legislation.

Mr. HEYBURN. This bill attempts neither to enlarge nor to diminish the rights of the State. We are not concerned in the rights of the State, except in considering that we may not trespass upon them. We have gone no further.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, let us test that. Let us suppose that every State in the Union had an efficient pure-food law, and I certainly hope that every State in the Union will soon have one, because there is no Senator in this Chamber who abhors the rascal that cheats the consumer more than I do. I believe that he ought to be subjected to a fine, and I believe that the man who will sell to the women and children of this country articles of food calculated to impair their health is a public enemy and ought to be sent to prison. No Senator here is more earnestly in favor of legislation against adulterated meat and drink than I am, but I insist that such legislation belongs to the States and not to the General Government, because with the States is left the right to control and the power to control the health and morals of their people. If every State in this Union had an efficient pure-food law, there would be no proposition of this kind in Congress, because it is not that the article is shipped from one State to another—that does no harm—it is when the article is sold within a State for consumption by its people that the damage begins.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not desire to catechise the Senator, but I should like to inquire as to his views in regard to the national quarantine laws—whether or not they would come within the same prohibition as he suggests in regard to this law.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, so far as a quarantine law relates to regulation in good faith of the foreign commerce of this country undoubtedly the power of the General Government prevails, but whenever, under the guise of regulating foreign or interstate commerce, the Federal Government attempts to enact a public health law it invades the rights and dominion of the States.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to inquire under what provision of the Constitution a quarantine law enacted by Congress may be upheld if not under the provision with which we are now dealing?

Mr. BAILEY. Under the interstate-commerce provision?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is under the police power.

Mr. BAILEY. I will simply, as the easier way, and probably the shorter way to answer, refer the Senator to the repeated decisions of the court. The Supreme Court of the United States has stated over and over again that a State, under the guise of regulating its police affairs, can not interfere with or interrupt commerce among the States. I accept that, and I maintain that the Federal Government, under the guise of regulating interstate commerce, can not take charge of the health or morals of the people of a State.

Mr. HEYBURN. I would ask the Senator if, under the provisions of the Constitution authorizing Congress to regulate commerce between the States, it is not competent for Congress to enact a law for the purpose of protecting any one State against imposition at the hands of another?

Mr. BAILEY. What kind of an imposition?

Mr. HEYBURN. For instance, to enact a law preventing the shipping of poisons from one State to another, or of gun cotton, or dynamite, or diseased clothing, or any other thing that involves a threat against the life or the health of the people. Does not the Senator think that that is commerce—that it is as much commerce as is a lottery ticket?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest to Senators that the debate is proceeding under the ten-minute rule. The Chair has liberally construed that rule during the course of the debate to-day. The Senator from Texas has exceeded the ten minutes, but, without objection, he may proceed.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Supreme Court has said—and it is received as a wise saying by every lawyer—that, as you approach the line that separates the interstate commerce power of the General Government from the police power of the several States, there is some difficulty in distinguishing between the two. Well, back from that line there is no difficulty. In certain cases it is easy to say this is a police regulation and therefore within the province of the State, and that is a commerce regulation between the States and therefore committed to the Federal Government. But as we go from the acknowledged and palpable exercise of this power by each government and approach the line that separates the two, it is not always easy to mark that line.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is a belt of indecision.

Mr. BAILEY. It must be largely a matter of conscience with a Senator. To illustrate what I mean by saying it is sometimes a matter of conscience with a Senator, let me state a case. A law is proposed in Congress levying a tax upon a given article. No man questions the power of Congress to raise revenue to support the Government, and yet if instead of voting for the bill for the sake of revenue a Senator votes for it for the purpose of regulating or suppressing within a State the manufacture of a given article, I submit that he evades, to put it mildly, the Constitution.

Or, again, if a Member of the House of Representatives chooses to introduce a bill imposing a tax of 25 cents per yard upon every piece of goods manufactured principally of cotton and partly of wool, commonly called "shoddy," any Member who supported that tax for the purpose of raising revenue would be well within his oath to support the Constitution; but if instead of supporting that tax for the purpose of raising revenue I really desired to suppress the manufacture of shoddy in the State of Massachusetts I would be violating my oath to support the Constitution, though I would be doing it in a manner which precluded a judicial inquiry into the question.

In the one case I would be performing a plain function of the Government to raise revenue. In the other case I would be controlling the question of manufacture in a sovereign State of the Union, which Congress is not competent to do, according to all the decisions of the Supreme Court. That doctrine did not begin with the Knight case. The old case of Coe against Errill is, in my judgment, as strong or a stronger case than that of the United States against the Knight Company. In the Coe against Errill case the court went so far as to say that notwithstanding the logs were cut in one State for the purpose of shipment into another State, they did not become the subject of interstate commerce until they had been delivered to the depot of the common carrier.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. Does the Senator now understand that the purpose for which a Senator supports a bill may, and frequently does, determine whether or not he ought to support it at all?

Mr. HEYBURN. I think it usually does.

Mr. BAILEY. Then——

Mr. HEYBURN. But I should like to say to the Senator——

Mr. BAILEY. Then let me put this to the Senator: Is the purpose of this bill to regulate commerce? If so, it is within the power of Congress. Or is the purpose of this bill to protect the health of the people of the several States? If so, that is a question for the States and not for the Congress.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to call the attention of the Senator to the provisions of the bill. Its provisions do not attach until the goods are delivered to the carrier. That takes it out of the Coe case. Its provisions do not attach until the goods are delivered for shipment. The provisions of the bill do not apply so long as the goods are in the hands of the manufacturer or factory, but only after they are actually delivered for shipment, which is a part of the process of shipment.

Mr. BAILEY. No bill could apply while the goods were in the hands of the manufacturer.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly not.

Mr. BAILEY. Because they are not then commerce.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly not.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator attaches the power of the Federal Government as quickly as he can.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is proper.

Mr. BAILEY. Therefore he need not assume that he has made any concession to the States on that score.

The harm does not come from the shipment of the goods. If they were shipped and never sold or consumed, no harm would be done. Therefore if the Federal Government can only control the question of shipment, the Federal Government has no evil to eradicate, because the evil is after the goods reach the State, and I repeat that is an evil completely within the power of the State to control.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is complete on the line of the States. That line of demarcation is so fine that you can not define it.

Mr. BAILEY. It is, in the minds of some people, but in the minds of some of us the line that separates the States of this Union is as broadly marked as is the duty of a Senator.

Mr. HEYBURN. In sentiment, yes; but I am talking about geographical lines.

Mr. BAILEY. In practice they are not, I regret to say.

Mr. HEYBURN. Part of the cargo on the train may be in one State and a part in another, in crossing the State line.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator knows—I assume the Senator knows—that the court has decided that a State can meet what we call contraband goods, if you please, at its border and forbid them to enter. One of the cases was where the court decided that a bale of goods that might bring infection to the people of the State could be forbidden to enter the State and could be burned at the water's edge under the power, sovereign, inherent, original, and complete——

Mr. MONEY. And inalienable.

Mr. BAILEY. And inalienable, as the Senator from Mississippi adds. The Supreme Court gives the Senator warrant for his statement. It says that this power of the State to protect the health of its people not only against injurious food articles, but to protect them against deception in trade, was one originally possessed by the States and was never surrendered to the Federal Government by them, and is one which the Federal Government can not exercise. What is the inspiration of this bill? More than once I have heard it stated in private conversation that the States will not pass these pure-food laws. If it does not please the people of the State of Idaho to protect themselves, they ought not to appeal to the people of Texas, because whenever the people of Texas assert their right to interference with the matter of health and morals in the State of Idaho, they must concede the right of the people of Idaho to interfere in the matter of the health and morals in the State of Texas.

My own opinion is that the people of every State in this Union can best be left to take care of their own morals and their own health, because they are incomparably more interested in their morals and in their health than are their neighbors in distant States.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. BAILEY. Let me carry that idea one step further.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. Some States do not punish murder with the same promptness and exactness that they ought, but shall we say that there ought to be a Federal law on that subject? Some States witness public lynchings upon regrettable occasions. Shall that be a sufficient warrant for the Federal Congress to legislate on that subject? Some States do not punish kidnaping. Perhaps the Senator from Idaho would like to amend the laws of Nebraska so that hereafter kidnapers would pay the penalty of their crime.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BAILEY. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. I certainly would not repeal the extradition law which would enable Idaho to assist any State, whether it be Nebraska or any other, in apprehending a guilty criminal and bringing him to justice.

Now, in regard to the State of Idaho, to which the Senator has referred, I would say that Idaho has a most excellent pure-food law and that it is enforced by a very intelligent officer, and if the State of Idaho can be protected by the assistance of the General Government against the introduction of articles that are contraband in Idaho the laws of Idaho will be much more effective in their results, and that is the object of this bill.

Mr. BAILEY. The State of Idaho does not need the assistance of the Federal Government, because the State of Idaho has complete and ample power to protect herself.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but she is much embarrassed under existing conditions by the introduction in unbroken packages and large shipment of goods that are contraband under the laws of Idaho, and it is impossible to surround any State with guards and stop every train at the border and inspect the contents of its cargo. Therefore much expense is added in the maintenance of our government and the enforcement of our laws by reason of the introduction of these contraband articles.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Idaho unconsciously betrays one of the reasons which actuate many Senators in supporting this measure. They think to make the Federal Government to bear the expense, but they deceive themselves. After all, the Federal Government has no money to pay these expenses except what it collects from the people of the States; and as it generally costs the Federal Government more to perform a given service than it does the States, the people are merely taking more money out of one pocket than they are putting back into the other, and thus the sum of it all in the end will be an actual loss. If the prosecuting attorneys in the State of Idaho will do their duty, in twelve months there will not be the sale of an illegal or prohibited article of food in that State.

And here, Mr. President, is the miserable condition to which we have come. We are no longer willing to pass criminal laws, and to stop with laying upon the evil disposed the command "Thou shalt not," adding to that command the sanction of a penalty. That used to be sufficient to insure obedience to the law, but is not in this day; and we now feel that we must organize a bureau and subject everybody's business to its inquisitorial power in order to hedge men about that they can not commit a crime, and thus relieve incompetent or indifferent public officials, who are unable or unwilling successfully to prosecute them when they do commit a crime.

What we need in this country is not more bureaus to supervise the business of the people; we need prosecuting attorneys who will put criminals, both great and small, in the penitentiaries of the land. That is what we need. Give me an efficient pure-food law in any State with capable State attorneys and it will be impossible for people to violate it very long. Put one manufacturer of poisoned food in the penitentiary and the others will hasten to obey the law. One conviction is worth more than a bureau like this.

Begin this way and what will come? Another Post-Office Department. Mr. President, I doubt if there is a despotism on the earth to-day that holds any single man in its dominion, with the same power over the business of its citizens, as the United States vest in the Postmaster-General of this country. He can close any man's business by simply saying that in his opinion it is fraudulently conducted. A clerk, upon an insufficient examination, can order a man's mail discontinued, interrupt the current of his correspondence, destroy his standing in the business community, and the citizen is absolutely without access to the courts to right the wrong. His business can be destroyed, his reputation can be ruined, his profits can be diverted to his competitors; and yet he is powerless to appeal, except to the same officer under whose order he has suffered this great wrong.

Now, undoubtedly it is true that the Government of the United States ought not to allow its service to be employed by scoundrels and cheats, but this way of lodging in the hands of one man the power to destroy the business of many men is un-American. You deny the man whose business is thus assailed resort to the courts of this country. If you take his horse, even for a public purpose, without making him just compensation, he can call you to the bar of justice; but a single individual, responsible to nobody but his own conscience, can destroy a man's business, injure or ruin his good name, and drive him into poverty and disgrace, from a business that he has built up by his industry and sagacity, leaving him without a remedy in the courts. Thus it is that bureau after bureau is built up, and we vest them with such extraordinary power, until the American Republic will become a bureaucracy instead of a democracy—a government in which the bureaus and not the people rule.

If the Federal Government has the power to pass an act regulating the use of adulterated, misbranded, and deleterious food, it ought to stop when it writes upon the statute books that it shall be a crime to commit such a commodity for shipment between the States or to foreign nations, and leave it to the integrity and efficiency of its judicial officers to vindicate the authority of its law.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, in some remarks which I submitted day before yesterday I stated that the convention of certain canning associations at Atlantic City declined to pass a resolution indorsing the Heyburn bill. That was controverted by a written statement made by the president of that convention, which was submitted to the Senate by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER.] This morning I have had handed me a statement which I desire to have read as a part of my remarks.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

In view of the statements made by Senator MCCUMBER in debate on the pure-food bill, on Monday, February 19, in which reference was made to the recent convention of the various canning associations, held at Atlantic City, N. J., I wish to correct any possible misinterpretation that might have resulted from the Senator's argument. I am the president of the National Food Manufacturers' Association, am a newspaper man by profession, and have been intimately connected with the canning trade for the last twenty years. I attended the convention at Atlantic City unofficially, so far as my relationship to the National Food Manufacturers' Association was concerned. I did not attend the convention for the purpose of securing any resolutions favoring the amendment offered by Senator MONEY in the Senate, and which our association indorses.

Contrary to the statement purporting to have been made by ex-President Frazier, I am an honorary member of each association represented at Atlantic City, and entitled to the floor, if desired.

The following morning after arriving in Atlantic City President Frazier, in his address, asked for a resolution indorsing the Heyburn bill, and all his official and private utterances were to the effect that a resolution should be passed favoring the Heyburn bill. Doctor Wiley was requested to address the association, in order, if possible, to win over any of those who might be wavering in their convictions regarding the Heyburn bill.

Shortly after President Frazier's address I learned that an attempt was to be made by President Frazier to railroad a resolution through favoring the Heyburn bill and cut off all debate by promptly adjourning the meeting thereafter. I at once went to President Frazier and told him that such a resolution could not pass and gave as my reasons for such a statement, first, that the canners did not know the provisions of the Heyburn bill, which would mean a continuation of the miscellaneous condemnation of their product without any hearing or conviction, which would mean commercial suicide to their brands and reputations as manufacturers of legitimate food products. On the basis of this statement I interviewed as many of the members of the association as possible in the short time that was at my disposal, with the result that a resolution was passed, which was framed at my dictation, and which favored no specific bill, notwithstanding Doctor Wiley's presence, and the attitude of President Frazier of the Western Packers' Canned Goods Association. The canners of the United States stand absolutely and unequivocably for pure-food legislation, but the resolution as passed is a striking indication of the feeling of the canners of the United States toward the Heyburn bill. I wish to add still further that Doctor Frazier did not come before Congress with any authority from either association in the matter, and, further, that he is no longer an officer in the association of which he was formerly president.

O. L. DEMING.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, as I said, I received that statement this morning, and I have had it read because of the fact that the statement I made previously was derived from newspaper sources and of course you can not always tell whether they are exactly correct or not. When my friend the Senator from North Dakota read the statement of Doctor Frazier, I accepted Doctor Frazier's statement as being substantially correct, but I received this statement this morning, and I wanted to put it into the RECORD, in order that those who have read the other statement may read this, which entirely contradicts it.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish very briefly to answer the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY].

Mr. President, the Senator from Texas has promulgated a legal doctrine here that I confess I have never before heard stated as a proposition relating to the limitation of the power of the Government under that clause of the Constitution relating to commerce between the States. The proposition of the Senator from Texas is simply that under the Constitution we can regulate commerce, but we can not regulate commerce for the very purpose of protecting the people of the several States against fraud and imposition by the manufacturers of other States. That proposition, I am ready to declare, can find no support in any of the decisions rendered by the Supreme Court of the United States. On the contrary, one of the prime objects in reference to the power of Congress over interstate commerce is to protect the people—not only to protect their pocketbooks, but to protect their lives; not only to protect them against injuries to the person, but also to protect them against fraud of any character.

Let us take the case as it affects the matter of competition. We prohibit any two lines of railroads from entering into an agreement whereby they destroy competition between the different States. For what purpose? Simply because it is an imposition upon the people of those States. It is to protect the pocketbooks of the people against the inposition of improper charges. We justify the power of Congress to appoint a body that shall fix rates by railroads in interstate commerce upon the ground that it will protect the people of the several States against improper charges, against unjust discrimination, against rebates. Every one of them is an element that affects the people themselves.

Now, that is carried out in every decision that has been given by the Supreme Court upon the question of the limitation of the power of the Government over interstate commerce, and I say not a single decision can be found that says or even intimates that we can not regulate commerce between the States for the very purpose of protecting the individuals of the State against fraud sought to be perpetrated by the individuals of another State.

We go further than that. We even go into the State of Ohio or into the State of West Virginia and we say to the coal operators there, "You have made an agreement whereby you are to fix the prices of coal in the several States of the Union." Under the authority of Congress over the interstate commerce of this nation we will condemn that. "Why?" "Because it interferes with free competition." "What harm does that do?" "Because it interferes with free competition, and thus injures the people of the States of Illinois and Ohio and Wisconsin, where those goods are to be shipped." So the very spirit, the whole soul of the power, is for the purpose of protecting the people against any character of imposition.

The Senator says give him a good prosecuting attorney in any of the States, under the authority of the law that may exist in any State, and he can prevent the importation of spurious drugs, etc. I agree entirely with the Senator from Texas upon the limitation of interstate commerce at the dividing line of original packages.

The State can seize the original package the moment it lands, provided that it is a fraud or is not a commercial article. There is the distinction that they make. If it is a commercial article, then the State can not touch it until it has been disposed of for sale and has passed under the State's jurisdiction.

But the police power of the State can take oleomargarine that is colored as yellow butter and sold for yellow butter. It does not need to wait until the original package is broken, because it is designed as a fraud upon the public, and therefore the police power can reach it.

But let us see what the Senator will do, Mr. President, with his district attorney. I will take a State like the State of Ohio, with its hundreds of thousands of freight trains passing through and across it from all sections of the country, every freight train loaded with box after box, with nothing but the name of the consignee upon a box.

This package is dropped off at this city, this package is dropped off at the next station, and 10,000, aye, 100,000 of those packages are dropped off daily and scattered all over the State. They do not show upon the face of them that they are frauds. I admit the State can get hold of them after they have arrived there, but it may be that two-thirds of them, or 90 per cent of them, are fraudulent goods imported from one State to another State. If the Senator had all the State attorneys and every county attorney busy in the State of Ohio, he could not reach 1 per cent of the entire amount of frauds that could be uncovered in a single day in that State.

Thus we desire, Mr. President, to supplement the power of the State. All of the States have their pure-food laws. All of them say "we do not want these articles;" but under the interstate commerce—the commerce from all over the country—these articles are dropping in and scattering over our State, so that an army of State officials could not in any possible way meet them.

Now, how do we supplement it? We come right back to the manufacturer. We say to the manufacturer: "You can not import those goods into a State." That is a power that we have got. We can say to every manufacturer and to every railroad: "You shall not take any fraudulent product into any State," the same as we can say to the authorities the Senator has spoken of in reference to the Post-Office that no fraudulent tickets shall pass from one State to the other.

Mr. President, the Senator would limit this authority to allowing every State to seize the article after it has been scattered daily over 10,000 cities or stations within the State. I can not conceive for one single moment that it is against the power of Congress to so regulate interstate commerce between the States that the very object shall be the protection of the people of that particular State.

I have but one word, Mr. President, to say in reference to the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY]. I know the high character and the integrity of the Senator, I know his good judgment, and I do not want him to think for a single moment that I fail to place upon those qualities the highest appreciation. But notwithstanding that I may have the reverence for the Senator from Mississippi that I might have for Isaac of old, I know the hand that reaches out from that association of manufacturers is the hand of Esau. I know the voice that speaks from that amendment prepared from that association of manufacturers is the voice of Jacob, and it is the voice of deception.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I believe I will ask to put an extract from the Plumley case in the RECORD, and an extract from the Rahrer case. I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary shall read the parts that I have marked.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Texas? If not, the Secretary will read as indicated:

The Secretary read as follows:

If there be any subject over which it would seem the States ought to have plenary control, and the power to legislate in respect to which it ought not to be supposed was intended to be surrendered to the General Government, it is the protection of the people against fraud and deception in the sale of food products. Such legislation may, indeed, indirectly or incidentally affect trade in such products transported from one State to another State; but that circumstance does not show that laws of the character alluded to are inconsistent with the power of Congress to regulate commerce among the States. (Plumley v. Massachusetts, 155 U. S., p. 472.)

Mr. BAILEY. Now, I ask that the Secretary read what I send to the desk, from 140 United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

The power of the State to impose restraints and burdens upon persons and property in conservation and promotion of the public health, good order, and prosperity is a power originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to the General Government nor directly restrained by the Constitution of the United States, and essentially exclusive.

And this court has uniformly recognized State legislation, legitimately for police purposes, as not in the sense of the Constitution necessarily infringing upon any right which has been confided expressly or by implication to the National Government. (In re Rahrer, 140 U. S., p. 555.)

Mr. BAILEY. Let the Secretary read over on the next page.

The Secretary read as follows:

In short, it is not to be doubted that the power to make the ordinary regulations of police remains with the individual States and can not be assumed by the National Government, and that in this respect it is not interfered with by the fourteenth amendment. (Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S., 27, 31; ibid., p. 555.)

Mr. BAILEY. Now, I will ask the Secretary to read one more extract from the Knight case.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest that the book and page go in the RECORD in both the former cases. They were not given at the desk.

Mr. BAILEY. Very well. The Rahrer case is 140 United States, and the Plumley case is 155 United States. The Knight case, as I remember, is 156 United States. I have sent it to the desk and ask the Secretary to read what I have marked.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested, without objection.

The Secretary read as follows:

It can not be denied that the power of a State to protect the lives, health, and property of its citizens, and to preserve good order and the public morals, "the power to govern men and things within the limits of its dominion," is a power originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to the General Government, nor directly restrained by the Constitution of the United States and, essentially exclusive. (United States v. E. C. Knight Co., 156 U. S., p. 11.)

Mr. KNOX. May I ask a question of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. KNOX. I did not get the benefit of the Senator's entire argument on the power of Congress to prohibit the transportation of impure food from State to State, and I only rise to ask the Senator if he has considered in that connection the case of Champion against Ames? Champion against Ames was a case where Congress undertook to prohibit the transportation from State to State of lottery tickets, not alone by the mails, but by any other means.

Mr. BAILEY. By express companies or otherwise.

Mr. KNOX. In that case—if the Senator will permit me just a moment—the court said:

We have said that the carrying from State to State of lottery tickets constitutes interstate commerce, and that the regulation of such commerce is within the power of Congress under the Constitution. Are we prepared to say that a provision which is, in effect, a prohibition of the carriage of such articles from State to State is not a fit or appropriate mode for the regulation of that particular kind of commerce? If lottery traffic carried on through interstate commerce is a matter of which Congress may take cognizance and over which its power may be exerted, can it be possible that it must tolerate the traffic and simply regulate the manner in which it may be carried on? Or may not Congress—

And here is the point—

Or may not Congress, for the protection of the people of all of the States, and under the power to regulate interstate commerce, devise such means, within the scope of the Constitution, and not prohibited by it, as will drive that traffic out of commerce among the States? (Lottery case, 188 U. S., p. 355.)

I only wanted to know whether in the conclusion the Senator has reached he considered that authority.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Lottery case, like the Nagle case, I never refer to if I can avoid it.

Mr. KNOX. The Senator does not agree with it?

Mr. BAILEY. I do not agree with it, and I think it is one of those instances where one hard case made bad law. Congress wanted to destroy the lottery and the court wanted to help. Hence the law first and then the decision. I do not agree to that decision, because a lottery is not commerce. It is gambling. Commerce is not gambling and gambling is not commerce.

But all the court decides in that case is that under the power to regulate commerce it may prohibit commerce. The contention was that the power to regulate did not include the power to prohibit. My own opinion is that so far as the case is worth anything it tends to establish the doctrine of a police power in the General Government, and if the argument, not as stated, but as implied, is followed, it seems to establish that. But you could not imply that to be the opinion of the court against the express and repeated declaration which I have just had read at the Clerk's desk.

It has been some little time since I have read those cases, and if I had taken the time before taking the floor to examine them I could have pointed out how in each one of those cases the court attempts to draw this line—sometimes shadowy and illusive, but still a line—between the commerce power of the General Government and the police power of the several States.

I say to the Senator from Pennsylvania, for whose opinion as a lawyer I have profound respect, that there is nothing, in my opinion, better settled in the decision of the courts than that the States only can exercise a general police power. The trouble with the court in the liquor cases was that they treated the question of intoxicating drinks as a matter of commerce rather than as a matter of police regulation, and I think I voice the sentiment of the profession at large when I express a sincere regret that the court did not in the beginning treat intoxicating liquors as more a matter of police than as a matter of commerce. If they had done that in the Bowman case first, or in the case of Leisy v. Hardin afterwards, we would not have had what is known as the "Wilson Act," which performs what, to my mind, is the absurd office of abdicating a power of Congress to the States of the Union.

As the decision in Bowman v. The Railroad, followed by the decision in Leisy v. Hardin, were wrong, they were followed by another wrong decision in the Rahrer case, where the court sustained the law of Iowa because the Federal Congress had permitted that law to prevail.

Under a just and proper distinction commerce—I mean interstate and foreign commerce—is for the nation to regulate. What is commerce within the State and what is police regulation is for each State to deal with for itself, and wisely so, because what may affect the health and morals of the people of Texas might not similarly affect the health and morals of the people of California. Morals do not change with latitude and longitude, as my distinguished friend from Idaho intimated a few moments ago; but health does change, and what would be health-giving in one climate might be health-destroying in another.

I am sincerely anxious that each State in this Union shall regulate its own domestic concerns without interference or suggestion from the outside, and when each State does that, and all the States do that, we have a harmonious system; we have the system contemplated and ordained by our fathers, a great number of local governments concerning themselves with local affairs, and a great government over them all attending to those concerns which affect them all. Thus, and thus only, can we preserve the ideal system created by the founders of this Republic.

When you invade the right of a State on one occasion it is followed by an inevitable invasion on another, and as you increase the power of the Federal Government to do what the States ought to do, the States, becoming unaccustomed to the exercise of their powers, finally become unfit to exercise them. It is as true of a State as it is of an individual that long disuse of a power destroys that power, and if the Federal Government in progressive encroachment upon the rights of the States is to finally deny them the right to safeguard the health and morals of their people, pray, Mr. President, what place have they in our system even as it exists to-day?

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. In line 5, page 10, after the words "or place," insert the word "therein."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table.

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President, I do not think that the Senator in charge of the bill will object to this amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. Will the Senator repeat the amendment? I did not catch it.

Mr. FULTON. In line 5, page 10, after the word "place," insert the word "therein." In a preceding section, on page 7, I think, where the framer of the bill employed the same language practically—where it refers to drugs—the word "therein" is used.

Mr. McCUMBER. It seems to me that the insertion of that word, as proposed by the Senator, destroys the phraseology of the sentence. I can not understand how it adds to it in any way. The sentence now reads:

Fourth. If the package containing it, or its label, shall bear any statement, design, or device regarding the ingredients or the substances contained therein, which statement, design, or device shall be false or misleading in any particular, or if the same is falsely branded as to the State, Territory, or place in which it is manufactured or produced.

Now, by adding the word "therein" after "place" it will read:

Or place therein in which it is manufactured or produced.

Mr. FULTON. As the text of the bill appears it would seem that it would differentiate the word "place" from a State or Territory. It might have reference to some other division—the district of Alaska or the islands. What I desire is that it shall be an offense against this act if the label shall be false not only as to a State or Territory, but as to the locality in a State or Territory where the article is packed.

Mr. HEYBURN. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the bill provides that the statement shall be correct as to the place—that is, as to the locality.

Mr. FULTON. Not in regard to food, I think. If it does, I shall be glad to have it pointed out.

Mr. HEYBURN. On line 16, page 7, that language was put in on the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. FULTON. Yes; on page 7, line 16. That applies to drugs. Now, on line 5, page 10, where the amendment I have offered comes in, it applies to food. I wish to have the same language employed there that has been employed in regard to drugs.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to say that the Senator would restrict the meaning simply to the "State, Territory, or place therein." It is intended that it shall cover every place, whether in foreign countries or in our own; in other words, that it shall be broad enough to cover a statement that goods were manufactured in Italy when, as a matter of fact, they were manufactured in New York. When the Senator limits it to the "State, Territory, or place therein," he means the place within such State or Territory.

Mr. FULTON. On page 7, line 16, where the same language in question is applied to the use of labels on drugs, the Senator employs this language:

If the package containing it, or its label, shall bear any statement regarding the ingredients or the substances contained therein, which statement shall be false or misleading in any particular, or if the same is falsely branded as to the country, State, or Territory, or place therein.

Why does he employ the word "therein" in that clause?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will explain that, Mr. President. If the word "country" was used in the second instance it would then conform to the first, but unfortunately the word "country" is at the wrong end of the sentence.

Mr. FULTON. I have no objection to the word "country." I suggest, then, that we insert the word "country."

Mr. HEYBURN. Before the word "State?"

Mr. FULTON. Yes; preceding the word "State."

Mr. HEYBURN. That would make it conform to the provision.

Mr. FULTON. I understand the Senator does not object to my amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Before the word "State," line 5, page 10, insert "country" and a comma.

Mr. FULTON. And the other amendment "therein," in line 5, page 10, is to be retained.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Did the Chair understand the Senator from Oregon to withdraw his first proposed amendment?

Mr. FULTON. I wish to retain the first amendment and enlarge the amendment I offered by inserting the word "country" immediately preceding the word "State" in the same line.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment as proposed will lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, on yesterday I called attention to the proviso at the foot of page 6, which I thought was faulty in its construction. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] suggested that he would draft it somewhat differently. I will ask the Senator if he has made the draft?

Mr. MCCUMBER. The draft has been made, Mr. President, and I have it here. We propose to strike out the word "not," in the last line on page 6, so as to read:

Provided, That no drug defined in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary shall be deemed to be adulterated under this provision if the standard of strength, quality, or purity be plainly stated upon the bottle, box, or other container thereof, etc.

Then we propose to strike out "as originally packed," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "although the standard may differ from that determined by the test laid down in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary."

Mr. GALLINGER. That proposed amendment meets entirely the objections which I made to this provision on yesterday, so that I shall have nothing further to say about it.

Mr. President, I offered on a previous day four amendments—one on page 4, line 19; another on page 4, line 24; another on page 7, line 24, and another on page 8, in lines 10 and 11. The amendment was simply to insert the words "in sufficient quantity to be." I have since then looked the bill over carefully, and I find there is a provision which practically covers that, and so I wish to now withdraw those amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments will be withdrawn.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I should now like the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] for a moment. His amendment on page 10 provides that:

In case of evaporated milk or so-called "evaporated cream," if the same shall contain 25 per cent solids, of which solids 28 per cent shall be butter fat.

The Senator proposes to make that amendment as to milk entering into interstate commerce. As was explained by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] yesterday, the object has been in drafting this bill that it should not attempt to fix standards at any place or on any occasion except such as are already fixed by the Pharmacopœia and National Formulary in drugs. But, Mr. President, I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that he is entirely protected under the provision on page 8, which is as follows:

In the case of food, an article shall be deemed to be adulterated—

* * * * * * *

Second. If any substance or substances has or have been substituted wholly or in part for the article.

Third. If any valuable constituent of the article has been wholly or in part abstracted.

So that in the manufacture of condensed milk, if it is the pure milk, although it might not be rich enough to contain the percentum of butter fat required in the amendment of the Senator from Washington, nevertheless it would be a marketable article; and we do not feel that we ought to prohibit the sale of pure condensed milk, even though it should not be from a cow that would give the richest kind of milk. Inasmuch as the other provision relates simply to the abstraction, it is rendered unfit for interstate commerce, provided there is anything abstracted from it. So if butter fat be abstracted from the milk and beef stearin or deodorized lard be substituted for the butter fat it would come under the inhibition contained in this bill. I simply desire to call the Senator's attention to it to show him that he is absolutely protected in getting a pure article of condensed milk under this proposed law.

Mr. PILES. I wish to ask the Senator a question. If, as he says, the object of my amendment is indirectly covered by the provision on page 8 of the bill, what objection would he have to making explicit the statement on that point?

Mr. MCCUMBER. The objection is to the fixing of a standard. I do not know whether the standard should be 25 per cent butter fat or whether it should not be; and I do not know that anyone else here knows absolutely as to that. But the object of the bill is simply to prevent fraud by extracting butter fat or anything else, and I suppose the cream or milk, as long as it is pure, can be sold in the market.

I desire to say one other word in reference to the authorities that were sent to the desk to be read by the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY]. The authorities he cites there do not in any way, as I understand, contravene in the slightest degree the statement I have made. There is no question but that Congress can not reach over into the States and attempt to perform the police powers of the States. The only proposition that I desire to stand upon is that Congress has the power to provide for conditions affecting interstate commerce, so that it may assist the States in the police power of those States. It does not exercise their powers in the slightest degree. It simply exercises the power of Congress over interstate commerce; and if that power is beneficial to the States or assists the States in any way in carrying out the provisions of their own police powers, it certainly can not be objectionable for that reason.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the Senator misunderstands the purpose for which I referred to those cases, and for which I had them read, if he supposes that I intended to argue in any way for the abridgment of the interstate-commerce power of the Federal Government. I referred to the Plumley case for the purpose of supporting my statement that a State could protect its people against a deception in trade and against unwholesome articles of food or drink; and I sought to establish the conclusion that as the power of the State in that respect was plenary, it could not be necessary for the Federal Government to pass any law on the subject.

I had the other extracts read for the purpose of showing that the courts have uniformly held that the police power is with the States and not with the Federal Government. If it be received as true that the general police power belongs now, originally, and always, with the governments of the States, then no part of it can be possessed or exercised by the Government of the United States. That argument I made simply for the purpose of submitting to each Senator's conscience whether he voted for this bill to regulate interstate commerce or to protect the health and morals of the people in his State, conceding freely that if the purpose be to regulate interstate commerce, it is a valid exercise of the power of Congress. I insist that if the purpose is to protect the health or morals of the people, then it is a matter that belongs to the States and not to the Federal Government; and that the only way to defend the bill is to contend that it is a regulation of commerce, when we know it is designed as a protection of health.

Mr. MCCUMBER. What I insist upon, Mr. President, is that we have the right to say that this is a regulation of commerce, but for the purpose of protecting the citizens of the States against the imposition of certain articles. Now, while the State may exercise its own power absolutely within its own jurisdiction and not without its territorial boundaries, the Congress may exercise its power that will exactly supplement or fit in with the power of the State, provided it keeps within its own jurisdiction, and that is the jurisdiction of interstate commerce. Sometimes there may be a conflict even in the State itself. Thus in the Liquor cases, Congress has the right, and not the State—the primary right—to determine what is a proper article of commerce. The State of Iowa may say, as a police regulation, that beer is injurious to her people and that it shall not be sold in the State of Iowa; but the Supreme Court comes in and says that whenever a question of that character arises—that is, whether an article is a commercial article—Congress must determine that and not the State. Thus in those cases the Supreme Court held the State could not prohibit it, that the police power of the State could not be exercised over the case of beer in the original package, although the State should declare it to be unfit for consumption in that State.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the court did not hold that. If the Senator will recall the case, the court held that that could not be done in the State of the law as it then stood; but Congress came along and passed the Wilson Act; and now the court holds that the State can.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is the same thing.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator, of course, understands me to concede, and not only to concede, but to assert, that commerce in liquors is for the General Government, as the courts have held, though in holding that they reversed the earlier decisions, and the earlier decisions were by a unanimous court while the later ones were by a divided court. The court did hold that liquor was a matter of commerce and not of police; but the courts have never held that the question of adulterated or poisonous foods is a question of commerce, and, on the contrary, have held expressly that they are matters of police.

Mr. McCUMBER. I agree entirely with the Senator. The court has held that way—that a fraudulent article or a poisonous article or one unfit from putrescence or otherwise, is not a commercial article; and therefore, it not being a commercial article, the State can deal with it the moment it enters the State boundary; but inherently the power is in the General Government to determine what is a commercial article and what is not a commercial article.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator can not find any warrant for that statement——

Mr. McCUMBER. But I find that even before the Beer case.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator does not mean to say, if Congress was to declare that diseased meat was a matter of interstate commerce and that no State should have the power to forbid the sale of it when imported from another State, and that the mere declaration by Congress would supersede the power of the State?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; I do not mean to say that Congress can declare that an article which is not naturally a commercial article can be made a commercial article; but the article which the Senator describes is not a commercial article, and can not be made a commercial article. Therefore Congress has no power to say to a State that it is a commercial article and that Congress will exercise its power over it until it has reached the State. That is the basis of the decision.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the Senator may make that statement a little too broad. Meat is an article of commerce very frequently——

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. In a condition that it ought not to be sold. It is a question for the State to determine. The State may permit it to be sold within its borders in that condition, or the State may forbid the sale of it in that exact condition if it chooses. So it does not necessarily depend upon its condition whether an article is merchantable or not, but it depends upon the law as applied to that condition.

My opinion clearly is that Congress can not declare diseased meat a commodity subject to the interstate-commerce power of the General Government, and thus defeat the police regulations of the State; nor can a State declare wholesome meat not an article of commerce, and thus withdraw it from the commerce power of the Federal Government.

The Senator and myself do not disagree very widely about the facts or about the law. The trouble is the Senator says he is doing this under the interstate-commerce clause for police purposes. That is just about the size of the difference between the Senator and myself.

Mr. McCUMBER. And the whole difference in our conclusion, Mr. President, is a difference upon the theory through which we arrive at a conclusion. The difference is upon the theory of the law.

We will take the case the Senator mentioned. Here is a quarter of beef. It starts for New York from the city of Chicago while it is in a fit condition. It is an article of commerce, and no State can interfere with it. If it gets as far as the State of Ohio, and, by reason of the surroundings, a condition of putrescence sets in, it no longer is an article of commerce, and the police power of the State of Ohio attaches immediately, whether Congress acts on it or not. I simply give that as an illustration to show that a putrescent article, one absolutely unfit for consumption, is one that Congress can not control under the interstate-commerce clause of the Constitution, nor one which it can prevent the States from controlling. But there are cases where a State may declare absolutely by its law that a certain article, pure for that article, is unfit to be used in that State, and Congress can go in and say, "That is not true; this is a commercial article, and while you can reach it, you can not reach it in the original, unbroken packages." A State may declare that veal shall not be sold in that State, because it is not as good as beef; but Congress can say, "You shall receive that veal into your State, whether you wish to or not, in the original, unbroken packages." That being the case, it seems to follow, as a natural conclusion, that Congress can so control the regulation of interstate commerce of the country not only as to exercise its power over an article when the sale of that article is against the law of the State, but, especially, where its sale may be, and in most instances would be, in conformity with the laws of the State.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. President, we are in a fair way to reach an agreement. If the Senator will cut out of his bill every provision that relates to those things that the State can prohibit the sale of, I will vote for it. But the trouble with it is that these pure, unadulterated things that the States can not deal with this bill does not touch.

Mr. McCUMBER. I can explain that in a moment. If the State were in the same position in which the United States is with reference to its ports of entry and could reach an article before it got scattered through the State, then I would say there would be no necessity whatever for a national law supplementing the State law. The National Government has officers at every port of entry and they examine every article that enters into a port, but no State could possibly keep a corps of officers to examine every train that takes goods into that State, to open every box of patent medicine or every box of canned goods that is supposed to contain salicylic acid or anything that is prohibited by that State. Therefore we have to take cognizance of the condition, and the condition is that so many of these impure, spurious articles are pouring like a mighty wave over the State boundary lines that there is no power within the State, without enormous expense, to check the dealings in adulterated articles. But Congress, by its supplemental law, very easily will be enabled to get right back to the manufacturers in the several States and can cut off the sale of these deleterious products probably within a year, because the moment a manufacturer finds that he must sell pure goods in a State he will cease to sell impure goods.

The reason given, Mr. President, by most of the manufacturers who are using preservatives, and so forth, that are prohibited in the States is this: They say: "We can not compete with others unless we use such colorings and such preservatives as will give the proper appearance." But if we place all the manufacturers exactly upon the same footing, so that each one is prohibited from using injurious articles, then all manufacturers, or nearly all of them—certainly all that desire to do an honest and conscientious business—will do business in the various States upon an equal footing.

I gave here the other day a statement made by the president of the Western Canners' Association, from the State of Wisconsin. He says that he cans peas. There are put up in this country a great many million—I think 700,000,000—cans of peas yearly. In all of his product he does not use any other ingredient than sugar and salt. The cans are sterilized; the food itself is sterilized, and it is placed in a can that is perfectly tight so far as the ingress of air is concerned. That is all the preservative he uses. He says, however, when he goes over into New York, or even in his own State, he is met with a character of canned goods that looks exactly like his own in all respects, but he finds that where he has to pay $10,000, under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, for the sugar that is to go into the article he cans, his competitor pays only $750 for saccharine made from a coal-tar product. Of course he can not compete in the market with that difference in the character of the goods used.

So you will see that the divers State laws so act that some of them drive the honest manufacturer out of business. With a law of this kind, if it is in the power of Congress to enact such a law—and it seems to me clearly to be within its power—we will eliminate the incentive for all these frauds.

Mr. BAILEY. You will drive the dishonest manufacturer out of business?

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope so.

Mr. BAILEY. I understood the Supreme Court to say that the question of manufacture was for the State, not for the Federal Government.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is, within the State?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the moment he manufactures and sells out of that State——

Mr. BAILEY. There can not be any manufacturing except within the State. I had supposed that whether they should be driven out of business or not was for the States to determine, under the Knight decision, but I understand now the Senator says that the purpose of this bill is to drive them out of business.

Mr. McCUMBER. The purpose of the bill is to drive them out of interstate-commerce business.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, no.

Mr. McCUMBER. Oh, Mr. President, certainly the Senator can not understand me or understand anyone on the floor of the Senate as making a ridiculous proposition that Congress could prevent a man manufacturing what he saw fit in a State and selling it wholly within that State.

Mr. BAILEY. Congress has taxed men out of the manufacturing business. I have no doubt the Senator helped pass the oleomargarine law. The very purpose of that law was to tax the manufacturers of oleomargarine out of business. It succeeded very largely——

Mr. McCUMBER. True.

Mr. BAILEY. But the Senator from South Dakota—I mean North Dakota——

Mr. McCUMBER. I do not want to hold the Senators from South Dakota responsible for my statements.

Mr. BAILEY. Those two Dakotas have given me a great deal of trouble since they were admitted to the Union; and the only thing that relieves it is that they send very excellent Senators here who vote for very bad bills now and then. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I asked the Senator if it was the expectation and purpose to destroy these dishonest manufacturers. He said "yes." He did not say that the purpose was to drive them out of interstate-commerce business. His purpose was to destroy them. I remind him that if he is not going to destroy the factory, he does not need to bother about their interstate-commerce business, because the minute they undertake to sell their goods in a State the power of that State attaches, and the State can prohibit it, even though the goods may be in original packages. Now I desire to ask the Senator this——

Mr. McCUMBER. Before the Senator asks me something else, may I answer the first proposition?

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator can answer them both at one time, because they are related to each other.

Mr. McCUMBER. Perhaps I had better answer the first proposition while it is fresh in my mind and fresh in the Senator's mind.

Mr. BAILEY. Perhaps that would be a little better.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator evidently is not taking into consideration the conditions of the manufacture of the spurious articles which are sold throughout the United States. There are a great number of manufacturers in the city of Chicago who do not sell one ounce of their goods in the State of Illinois. The Illinois law prohibits the sale of their products. They ship them out of that State into another State. If the State where the manufacturing esablishment is situated prohibits the sale in that State, and then that prohibition is supplemented by a law of Congress prohibiting the shipment of that spurious article into another State, it necessarily follows that that manufacturer is going to be driven out of business, does it not? He will be driven out of the business purely as an interstate-commerce matter.

Mr. BAILEY. And thus the power of Congress to suppress a manufactory in a State is asserted and enforced, because it is the law of Congress that closes up the State manufactory. In other words, the law of Congress draws about a dishonest factory a circle of fire which comes closer and closer until it destroys that factory, because, according to the Senator's statement, factories producing articles prohibited to be sold in the State will flourish in the State of Illinois until the law of Congress becomes effective. If that is a conclusive proof, this bill will do what the Supreme Court has said can only be done by a State—indirectly I grant you—control the manufacture of a given article in a State.

Now, I put this question to the Senator—and sometimes it is a very useful way to argue by asking questions: Suppose a factory located in the State of Indiana were producing a given commodity and that commodity were finding a ready sale in the State of Kentucky, which is only separated from Indiana by a river; their taste makes it agreeable and palatable, and, so far as they have been able to discern, it produces no injurious effect upon their health. Thus a citizen of Kentucky willingly purchases from the manufacturer in Indiana the given article. It is a lawful industry in Indiana, where the manufacture is conducted, and a lawful business to sell it in the State of Kentucky. What will the Senator say to the proposition that a law of Congress shall be put upon the books suppressing in effect the lawful enterprise of Indiana and suppressing in terms the shipment of that lawful product to the State of Kentucky?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is very easy, in my opinion, to answer that proposition. Congress, through its inherent power over interstate commerce, has the right to determine what is a commercial article.

Mr. BAILEY. I deny that utterly.

Mr. McCUMBER. It has a right to determine what is not a commercial article. It has determined what was a commercial article as against the opinion of the State of Iowa that it was not a commercial article.

Mr. BAILEY. But it did not do it against the opinion of Massachusetts in a food-product case.

Mr. McCUMBER. One question often answers another. It has the same right in this matter that it has to say that the mail service of the country shall not be used for the purpose of taking a lottery ticket from Louisiana to the same State of Kentucky. It may be that the people of Kentucky believe in gambling; that they like lottery tickets; that they have no objection to lottery tickets; that they have no objection to these little games of chance, but Congress comes in, and, notwithstanding the idea of the people of the State of Kentucky, says to the man carrying on his business in Louisiana, "You shall not send your certificates of chance to the State of Kentucky." The one is just the same as the other. Congress may finally determine the matter.

The people of Illinois might be perfectly satisfied with the prices charged for coal from the State of West Virginia, and yet, when three or four persons in West Virginia get together and say they will make a contract and that coal shall be mined only to a certain extent; that it shall be sold in the State of Indiana for a certain price, in Missouri for another price, and in Illinois for still another price, neither Illinois nor Ohio nor Indiana nor Missouri may make any complaint whatever.

Congress says "this is an imposition upon the people of those States; they are entitled to the full spirit of competition between the several producers, and you must enter into no contract whatever to reduce the amount of the output from your mines, and you must enter into no contract whatever that will prevent this spirit of free competition." Congress does not ask the opinion of the people to which the coal is consigned. It is decided upon the broad proposition, as I understand, that Congress can regulate commerce for the benefit of the people.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator certainly has not understood me as denying that. I have been insisting all the afternoon that the power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign nations is a Federal power, but I have maintained that the right to protect health and morals is a police power.

Surely the Senator does not think his illustration about coal touches the issue between him and me. The Senator understands that, like him, I believe in the power of the Government to protect the people against unlawful combinations with respect to commerce. That is the Addistone Pipe case, properly decided, as I think—very properly. But that does not come to the point in issue between the Senator and myself. I am one of those States rights men who believe that it is just as important to preserve the power of the Federal Government in its sphere as it is to preserve the power of the States within their sphere. My theory of this dual system of government is that the power of one begins where the power of the other ends and that there never can be any necessary conflict between the two. I am contending for that very principle. I am contending that while we recognize the right of Congress to regulate commerce between the States, we will not invade, by the General Government, the reserved power of the States to regulate their police affairs.

It again comes back to the point I stated and restated: If this is a regulation of commerce, well and good. The only question then is, Is it a wise one? But if this is a regulation of police affairs, then the Federal Government has no power to pass any such law, and I believe the Senator from North Dakota will be frank enough to say that the Federal Government has no power to pass a police regulation for the States, will he not?

Mr. McCUMBER. The only thing on which we seem to differ at all is at the point where these two powers come in contact with each other.

Mr. BAILEY. We could not differ at any other place.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me make it clear. While one can not overlap the other in the slightest degree, nevertheless the one can be so exercised that it will supplement the other and be in exact harmony with it; and my claim is that that is as far as this bill possibly goes; that we do not go outside of the domain of interstate commerce. There we stop. But we can pass a law, under our authority over interstate commerce, the result of which will be to assist the citizens of a State to enforce the police power of that State. Now, that is as far as this bill goes, and as far as I contend we can go.

Mr. BAILEY. The trouble about that, Mr. President, if we go back to the statement of the Illinois and the Kentucky case, is that States might have a very different opinion of their police duty from that of the Federal Government, and the Senator says, practically, that the Federal Government ought to overrule them by referring to the instance of the coal combination. The Senator must come back and deal with that not as a coal combination—that is admittedly a question of interstate commerce—but deal with it according to the commodities in this bill, deal with it according to deleterious and injurious food products.

Suppose the State of Indiana should authorize the manufacture of a given commodity, and suppose the State of Kentucky were to permit it to be sold within her borders, both holding that it was not injurious to the health of their people. The Federal Government comes along and says, "It is, and thus we overrule you in respect to the health of your own people."

Mr. McCUMBER. No.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, I am going one step further.

Mr. McCUMBER. That is not what the Government says.

Mr. BAILEY. I am not going to leave it in that indefinite way.

Take oleomargarine. Suppose the State of Indiana permitted the manufacture of oleomargarine within her borders. There are a large number of scientific gentlemen—and I do not always have as much respect for them as they seem to have for themselves, because I find they are just as frequently at difference with each other as lawyers are about the law, or as politicians about legislation, but I assume that they understand their profession—who say that, when oleomargarine is manufactured in a proper way, it is a wholesome food product. Now, the State of Kentucky shares with Indiana that opinion as to oleomargarine, whether colored or uncolored, to resemble butter, and thus it is lawful in one State to manufacture and lawful in the other State to sell it.

The Senator from North Dakota says that the Federal Government shall come along and, assuming the right to judge above the people of those States immediately concerned, prevent the shipment of this article from one State to the other.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator does not quote me correctly. I will say that now.

Mr. BAILEY. I hope I do not, because I would hate to see the Senator from North Dakota take such a position.

Mr. McCUMBER. I have tried to make it clear again and again that the Congress could not declare a purely commercial article not to be a commercial article.

Mr. BAILEY. The trouble of it is in this case it declares that the man who manufactures it in the State in which it is manufactured shall not ship it into another State.

Mr. McCUMBER. Let us take the liquor case.

Mr. BAILEY. Congress, according to the Senator's theory, can only deal with merchantable articles—articles which are the subject of commerce. Now, that far he and I agree, but whenever I get him around to the point of taking an article confessedly relating to the police power, then he goes back, as he did in the Missouri coal instance, to a purely commercial question.

I want the Senator to say this, and I shall be satisfied: I want the Senator to say that the Federal Government has not the right to pass police laws. I want the Senator further to say that the right to provide police regulations is, in the language of the Supreme Court, an original, inherent, and exclusive right of the States. Now, if the Senator will agree on that, there is no possible room for difference between him and me, except as to what are articles falling within the police power.

If the Senator will indulge me long enough, I will say, with respect to the liquor case, that he knows, of course, that the basis of the court's decision in that case was that it was not necessarily a matter within the police power. He further knows that in the Plumley case they decided that a given article, not necessarily injurious to health, but merely colored, so as to practice a deception of trade, was wholly within the power of the State, and not within the power of the Federal Government. The Senator recognizes that, does he not?

Mr. McCUMBER. Very well.

Mr. BAILEY. Then the difference between the Senator and me is that the Senator wants to pass this bill under the commerce clause for the purpose of making a police regulation. That is the whole of it.

Mr. McCUMBER. The only thing on which we differ again is that same proposition as to whether the Government in this case is exercising a police power or whether it is exercising its power of regulation of interstate commerce, the result of which may be to affect the police powers in the State, not always necessarily, but may be.

Let me make myself clear upon that proposition. As a proposition of law the Congress can not make police regulations for the State. It can not legislate for the State.

Mr. BAILEY. Can it make police regulations at all?

Mr. McCUMBER. It can make a regulation as to what shall enter into interstate commerce, even though that regulation may be in some instances against the police regulation of the State and in more instances in harmony with the police regulation of the State. That is all we contend for.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to say——

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me take another case. It gives the opposite view. Suppose there is no law or regulation in any State against the sale of putrid animal flesh in a State. Can the Congress enact legislation that no putrid animal substance shall be a matter of interstate commerce? I think the Senator will agree that it can. And if it can eliminate it from commerce, it can eliminate it despite the fact that the State itself would not keep it outside of its boundary.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, the vote is set for 5 o'clock; and as nobody else seems to feel any interest in the matter I will entertain myself with the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope the entertaining will be beneficial at least to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. I thought the Senator yielded to me for a moment.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield to both Senators.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire merely to make a statement.

Mr. BAILEY. Let me finish this.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator will pardon me, I wish merely to make a suggestion in reference to the conduct of the debate, I being in charge of the bill.

There are certain amendments which have to be arranged, and I desire to have the last fifteen minutes of the time to take up and briefly review those amendments. Fifteen minutes will be sufficient, and I ask the consent of the Senate for that purpose.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Idaho? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BAILEY. These interruptions and colloquies have not been altogether useless at last. The Senator from North Dakota admits that the Federal Government can not pass police regulations to operate within the State—or for the State, as he expresses it. Of course the Senator could have broadened that statement and said that the Federal Government has no general police power.

I want to bring that principle to apply at this time as a supreme test, and I tell the Senator there is hardly a line in this bill which, under every accepted definition, is not a matter of police regulation. If this bill were pending in the legislature of any State in the Union and its provisions were assailed for lack of authority to pass it, the authority would be found in the general police power of the State. That is the argument which supports it here. It is purely and only a police regulation; and the Senator from North Dakota, with a subtlety that does his ingenuity more credit than it does his candor, continually asserts that it is a regulation of commerce intended to assist the States in ordering their police affairs. Now, it is a rather remarkable circumstance that a regulation of Congress is going to settle the police affairs of a State. If it is a police affair within the State it is a police affair under the Federal law.

Another trouble that the Senator from North Dakota has, and that really explains his ardent support of this bill, is that he is afraid that the frauds are too multitudinous for the States to deal with. He said that in the State of Ohio there were 10,000 cities. There are not that many in the whole United States. But the Senator need have no fear of that. There are 90,000,000 people in the United States, or nearly that number, and most of them are honest men. If they are all going to violate the law, you can not enforce it. In the first place, there would not be enough prosecuting attorneys; and if there were the rascals would constitute a majority of the jury and could turn each other loose. The extent of the frauds need not give the Senator any alarm. While crime is prevalent and cheating is in progress, it is not so widespread as that.

I think the merchants and manufacturers are hardly as bad as they are painted here. It will need only a little while to put the bad ones in jail, and make the others honest as a matter of interest.

The Senator from North Dakota need have no fear that the States of this Union will not preserve the health and morals of their people. If they do not, this system is a failure; and what I reprobate is that every time justice seems to miscarry in a State, they appeal to the Federal Congress for a law. A few great scoundrels in New York, as officers of insurance companies, stole trust funds, and straightway the people come petitioning Congress for a law to regulate insurance throughout the United States; and that, too, in the face of the fact that the Supreme Court, in a well-considered opinion, concurred in by all the justices, and repeatedly indorsed in subsequent decisions, has expressly decided that insurance is not for Federal regulation. Three or four men stole or dissipated trust funds. That was a crime which ought to have been punished. Those men, perhaps, ought to be wearing stripes and living in prison instead of wearing purple and fine linen and living in palaces. But because a State allows some great rascal to escape is no reason why we should call upon the States to abdicate their powers to the Federal Government.

That is the vice of all these evil times. When something happens in a State not exactly according to the trend of public sentiment, the people rush to Congress, until it will happen after a while that Congress will have so much to do that it will do nothing well. We have nearly reached that time now.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, the Senator from Texas has discussed in his last address both the legal proposition and the propriety of the legislation. I wish to say but a word further upon the legal proposition, and we come right back to a question which I direct to the Senator from Texas.

Under the authority of Congress over interstate commerce, can we, by a law, declare that any dynamite transshipped from one State to another shall have affixed to the box the word "dynamite?" If we have that power, what power is it? Is it a police power or is it a regulating power? If it is a regulating power, what is the purpose of the regulation? The purpose manifestly must be the preservation of human life; but the preservation of human life comes within the police power. The preservation of human life is governed by the laws of all the States. Yet we may enact, in my candid opinion, a law regulating commerce in dynamite, providing that every box containing dynamite shall be marked "dynamite," and that would be done for the very purpose of protecting the people of the States through which the dynamite is about to pass. It is not an exercise of the police power. It is the exercise of a regulating power, though its object may be and its intendment may be for the protection of human life in the several States, and it may operate to a certain extent as a police power would operate.

As to the merits of the case, as the Senator from Texas has spoken on that subject, I will submit only a few remarks. The Senator says: "Punish some of the persons who are vending these articles in the States, and then there will be no more of it." Take the State of North Dakota. I have here, or did have, a large list, covering many pages of a daily paper, showing the different articles that were misbranded or adulterated in that State. They come from all sections of the United States.

Many of them come from the manufacturers who are mentioned in this organization which is fighting the pure-food bill. Now, suppose you do prosecute one of these retailers. He sends into Ohio or Chicago and orders some maple sirup. He is entitled to get maple sirup. He gets an adulterated article, and when he sells it for maple sirup he has committed no moral offense. Punishing him will not help. You are punishing the innocent for the crime of the guilty.

The best legislation to deal with crime is legislation that will get right at the root of the crime, and if the root of all of this evil is planted in that territory over which Congress has exclusive jurisdiction—the realm of interstate commerce—though its branches reach over into and drop its spurious fruit into every State, the best legislation is the legislation that can reach at it directly and not the legislation that can reach at it indirectly.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McCUMBER. With pleasure.

Mr. STONE. I desire to break in for just a moment on this interesting and somewhat protracted discussion to ask the Senator from North Dakota a question relating to one feature of the bill.

I recur to the last clause of section 9, page 11, relating to the misbranding of liquor. The language I call attention to, embraced in the first four or five lines, is that liquor shall be deemed misbranded:

First. If it is blended or rectified, or consists of an admixture of different grades of the same liquor—

And now particularly the words which follow:

Or contains, or is mixed with, other substances, and such fact is not plainly stated on the package in which such liquor is offered for sale, etc.

I happen to know (at least I have been so informed that I can state I know it to be true) that in some of the central Western States—like Missouri, Iowa, and Illinois—wine manufacturing is carried on to a considerable extent in a large way practically. The grapes used by the manufacturer of these domestic wines are grown for the most part, not wholly, along the Missouri Valley and the adjacent hills. These grapes—and I think it is true of all grapes grown east of the Rocky Mountains—contain such a high degree of acid matter that it is impossible to make palatable wine out of the pure juice of the grape.

In consequence of that fact it is necessary to add a considerable amount—what the quantity is I do not know—but to add an amount of sugar to raise the saccharine quality of the wine and to dilute it to a certain extent with pure water; and in some kinds of grape wine made in this region a little brandy is added. It is not always done, but in some localities that is true. I understand that in California the grapes grown there are semitropical, and it is not necessary to make these additions to the wine.

What I want to know of the Senator is what would the manufacturers of these wines have to do under the bill? They put only sugar and water and it may be in some cases a little brandy in. What would the manufacturer have to place on his package in order not to violate this provision against misbranding?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, under this provision he could manufacture his wine as a manufactured product in the usual process. Sugar is an article that is used, I presume, in all wines. There may be cases in which the juice is so sweet that sugar or saccharine is not necessary, but when so used it is as much a part of the product itself as salt is a part of a product that we use with our daily food. It is understood that it is to be used in the manufacture of wine.

Now, if the manufacturer blends that with something else, if he mixes it with other character of wines, if he changes the nature of it by putting in alcohol or wood alcohol or brandy or gin or something else, it would be a blended wine. He would by blending with a little alcohol—a little brandy to give it its flavor—change the nature from the original wine; and all he would have to show upon that product would be that it was blended. If he simply uses sugar or any other ingredients that are naturally used in the manufacture of wine, there would have to be nothing placed upon the container.

Mr. STONE. Nothing, in the opinion of the Senator?

Mr. McCUMBER. Nothing, in my opinion.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McCUMBER. I do.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, of course the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from North Dakota must be anxious—and I know they are anxious; I know their good faith—that the bill shall have as much consideration as shall be needed to render its validity as certain as we may render things of the sort certain.

I am persuaded that the lack of standard provided by law, in connection with the offenses denounced in the bill and punished by the provisions of the bill, is very dangerous to it. Of course, the fundamental sections, the jurisdictional sections of the bill, are the first and the second. The first section punishes by a very severe penalty—none too severe, probably—persons who "manufacture, sell, offer for sale, or deliver for shipment, or cause to be delivered, shipped, or transported from within any State, etc., to another State, Territory, etc., any article of food, drugs, medicines, or liquors which is adulterated or misbranded, or which contains any poisonous or deleterious substance within the meaning of this act." The second section is substantially the same.

No lawyer will challenge the proposition for a moment that there is an utter lack of standard, except it be supplied in the bill thereafter, and that there is no standard supplied in the bill thereafter except as to drugs. Whether an article is deleterious or not is a question of fact to be determined by a jury. All through the bill there are questions of fact to be determined by a jury. There is no standard rendering definite the offense. There is nothing putting a man on notice in advance of a standard to which he must live and toward which and in obedience to which he must shape his business.

I want to call the attention of the Senators to the fact that it is a want of the certainty which the Supreme Court of the United States has held to be absolutely essential in criminal statutes. If the Senators will look at the case of McChord v. Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company, 183 United States, I think they will find a case which fits this bill, except as to the portions of it which clearly do provide definiteness of standard. Referring to the following act of the Kentucky legislature:

If any railroad corporation shall charge, collect, or receive more than a just and reasonable rate of toll or compensation for the transportation of passengers or freight in this State, or for the use of any railroad car upon its track, or upon any track it has control of or the right to use in this State, it shall be guilty of extortion.

Which was made punishable by the statute, the court says:

In Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company v. Commonwealth (99 Ky., 132), this section was considered. The court held that the section could not be enforced as a penal statute for want of certainty, and said:

"That this statute leaves uncertain what shall be deemed a 'just and reasonable rate of toll or compensation,' can not be denied, and that different juries might reach different conclusions, on the same testimony, as to whether or not an offense had been committed, must also be conceded.

"The criminality"—

Italicizing the word—

"The criminality of the carrier's act, therefore, depends on the jury's view of the reasonableness of the rate charged; and this latter depends on many uncertain and complicated elements."

* * * * * * *

There is no standard whatever fixed by the statute, or attempted to be fixed, by which the carrier may regulate its conduct; and it seems clear to us to be utterly repugnant to our system of laws to punish a person for an act, the criminality of which depends, not on any standard erected by the law, which may be known in advance, but on one erected by a jury. And especially so as that standard must be as variable and uncertain as the views of different juries may suggest, and as to which nothing can be known until after the commission of the crime.

This was approved by the Supreme Court in the McChord case.

The court referred to and quoted from Chicago, Burlington, etc., Railroad v. Jones (149 Ill., 361) and Chicago, etc., Railroad v. The People (77 Ill., 443), in which it was held under a similar statute that the want of certainty in lack of reference to a standard under its first section was obviated by its eighth section, providing for the making by the railroad and warehouse commissioners of schedules of reasonable and maximum rates, which, being done, the supreme court of Illinois said: "There will be a standard of what is fair and reasonable, and the statute can be conformed to and obeyed." (McChord v. Louisville and Nashville Railroad Co., 183 U. S., pp. 498, 499.)

I simply wanted to commend it to the Senators in charge of this bill with a view to some amendment here or elsewhere of the bill in the respect to which I called their attention awhile ago and again now as to necessity for standards or definiteness as to offenses.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I regret it did not occur to the Senator to raise this question earlier. The time now before the vote is so short that I can only say it is not customary, nor has it ever been held necessary in providing for the punishment of a crime, to define in the act what constitutes the crime. Certain offenses are so well established in the law as to their meaning by the interpretation of the courts that we do not, every time we say that a man shall be guilty of burglary, define the term "burglary." When, in another class of statutes, we say that a rate shall be reasonable and just, did the Supreme Court of the United States ever object to that statute on the ground that what was reasonable and just was a question of law for the court to determine? The statute does not say what shall be reasonable or just or what shall constitute a reasonable or just charge.

I might follow that out; there are plenty of authorities to sustain the proposition; but I have not the time at this hour.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator might simply add that, in this case, we have no standard of anything. We simply say that if a party mixes two kinds of liquor, he should mark it "Blended." There is no standard to go by.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have but a very few minutes in which to call the attention of the Senate to a conclusion we have reached, and to the situation of the bill now before the Senate. On page 2, in line 19, after the word "drugs," the committee propose to amend by inserting the words "or liquors"—that was merely left out in printing—so that the bill may be perfected in that way. The committee amendments already passed upon some time since are in italics.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated at the desk.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 19, before the word "drugs," strike out the word "or;" and in line 18, after the word "food," insert a comma, so as to read "food, drugs;" and after the word "drugs" insert "or liquors."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will lie on the table.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, on page 5, there is a committee amendment, which is re-formed, and which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. Amend, on page 5, line 3, by inserting after the word "and" the words "after final judgment of the court." Strike out the word "the" on the same page, line 4, and insert in lieu thereof the word "such." After the word "as," in the same line and page, insert the words "may be prescribed by."

After the word "regulations," line 5, on the same page, insert the words "of the Department of Agriculture." Strike out the remainder of line 5, same page, also all of lines 6 and 7, and all down to the last word of line 8, the word "party," and insert the word "any" before "party" as the beginning of a new sentence, so as to read: "Any party," etc. In line 9, on the same page, strike out the words "as may be;" and after the word "act," in the same line, on the same page, insert the words "shall be given."

Mr. HEYBURN. Also, in line 8, after the word "party," strike out "as" and insert "who;" so as to read: "Any party who may be charged."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will lie on the table.

Mr. HEYBURN. On page 10, line 5, insert the word "country" before the word "State."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be reported.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 5, before the word "State," insert the word "country;" and after the word "place," in the same line, the word "therein" was proposed to be inserted by Mr. FULTON.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will lie on the table.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am now suggesting the amendments that the committee accepts, and no others. The committee accepts the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], in line 22, page 10, and also the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] on page 11, lines 4, 5, and 6.

Mr. GALLINGER. Leaving out the words "or opium?"

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator desires to add the words "or opium" I shall not object.

Mr. LODGE. I will make that modification.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then we will accept the modification by the Senator from Massachusetts. On page 11, line 24, strike out the word "convicted" and insert the word "prosecuted."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will lie on the table. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I ask the Senator whether the amendment proposed by my colleague [Mr. HEMENWAY] has been accepted?

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. You propose not to accept the modification?

Mr. HEYBURN. I will come back to that amendment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Very good.

Mr. HEYBURN. On page 12, line 22, after the word "of," insert the words "Agriculture or Secretary of." That is another case where in the printing they have dropped out the words.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest to the Senator from Idaho that all the amendments that he is directing attention to now have heretofore been stated and are on the table.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that; but the Chair will see in a moment my object in stating them. On page 14, line 15, after the word "to," insert the words "the provisions of this act or."

I desire, before the time expires, to say, Mr. President, these are the amendments that the committee accepts. The other amendments the committee declines to accept.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. With the exception of a modification of the amendment proposed by my colleague.

Mr. HEYBURN. With the exception of a modification, if it is accepted by the Senator offering the amendment.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is the modification suggested yesterday. My colleague is present now.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is proposed to modify the amendment offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY], on page 7, line 11, after the word "statement," by inserting the words "as to" and then inserting the word "constituent." Now, Mr. President——

Mr. FULTON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not want to yield now, because I have but a minute and a half.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Idaho declines to yield.

Mr. HEYBURN. At the bottom of page 6, the committee accepts the modification proposed by the Senator from North Dakota, which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment of the Senator from North Dakota will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, line 4, strike out the words "as originally packed" and insert in lieu thereof the words "although the standard may differ from that determined by the test laid down in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will lie on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, that is not all.

Mr. HEYBURN. On page 6, line 25, strike out the word "not." Those are the amendments that are acceptable to the committee and none others.

Mr. LODGE. I understand the Senator does not accept my amendment on page 8.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; not the amendment with reference to the wrapping.

Mr. SPOONER. I wish to ask the Senator whether the word "convicted" has been stricken out?

Mr. HEYBURN. That has already been changed and the word "prosecuted" substituted for it. Mr. President, I suppose we will vote on the substitute first.

Mr. KEAN. We must first perfect the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will first be perfected. The hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, under the unanimous-consent agreement the Senate will proceed to vote upon the pending amendments and amendments to be offered to the bill. Without objection, the amendments will be taken up in the order they appear in the bill.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Is not a vote first to be taken upon the substitute?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No; the question first comes upon perfecting the text of the bill, and then the substitute will be in order.

Mr. MONEY. All right.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the first amendment proposed.

The SECRETARY. The first amendment proposed by the chairman of the committee is on page 2, line 19, after the word "food," at the end of line 18, to insert a comma.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In line 19, before the word "drugs," strike out the word "or;" and after the word "drugs" insert the words "or liquors."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 5 of the bill——

Mr. GALLINGER. On page 3.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the amendments proposed by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] on page 4 have been withdrawn.

Mr. GALLINGER. They have been withdrawn, but there is an amendment on page 3, line 4.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The committee amendments appearing in italics have hitherto been agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. All right.

The SECRETARY. On page 5 of the bill, line 3, before the word "public," insert the following words: "After final judgment of the court."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In line 4 strike out the word "the," where it first occurs, and insert in lieu the word "such."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. After the words "manner as," at the end of line 4, insert the words "may be prescribed by."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In line 5, after the word "regulations," insert the words "of the Department of Agriculture."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. After the word "regulations" strike out the following words:

May prescribe to all other persons, association of persons, or corporations in whose possession like articles may be found or known to be that such article is within the provision of this act; and shall give such.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In line 8, before the word "party," at the end of the line, insert the word "Any," with a capital "A," beginning the sentence.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. After the word "party," in line 8, and before the word "may," at the beginning of line 9, strike out the word "as" and insert "who."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. In line 9, after the word "act," insert the words "shall be given."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. With those amendments adopted the clause will read:

The Secretary of Agriculture shall cause notice thereof to be given to the parties from whom such samples were obtained, and after final judgment of the court public notice of such facts shall be given by publication in such manner as may be prescribed by the rules and regulations of the Department of Agriculture. Any party who may be charged with violation of this act shall be given an opportunity to be heard, etc.

On page 6 of the bill, line 25, the last line, after the word "drug," strike out the word "not."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 7, of the committee amendments, as agreed to by the committee, line 4, after the word "thereof," strike out the words "as originally packed" and insert the words "although the standard may be different from that determined by the test laid down in the United States Pharmacopœia or National Formulary."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On the same page, line 11, after the word "statement," strike out the words "regarding the" and insert "as to its constituent."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. HEMENWAY] in lines 11, 12, and 13 has been withdrawn.

Mr. HEMENWAY. The modification, I think, covers the object sought to be reached by the amendment offered by myself.

The SECRETARY. As amended the clause will read, beginning line 10, page 7:

Second. If the package containing it, or its label, shall bear any statement as to its constituent ingredients or the substances contained therein, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] has withdrawn his proposed amendment at the bottom of page 7.

Mr. GALLINGER. That is right; and also on page 8.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Also on page 8.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is one proposed by Mr. LODGE, on page 8, line 19, after the word "preparation," to insert the following:

Provided further, That when in the preparation of food products for shipment they are preserved by an external application applied in such manner that the preservative is necessarily removed mechanically or by maceration in water or otherwise, the provisions of this act shall be construed as applying only when said products are ready for consumption.

This amendment Mr. MCCUMBER has moved to amend, in line 24, by striking out the words "or otherwise," and inserting the following:

And directions for the removal of said preservative shall be printed on the cover of the package.

Mr. LODGE. I have no objection to the insertion proposed by the Senator from North Dakota, but I object to striking out the words "or otherwise."

Mr. MCCUMBER. I consent that my amendment may be so modified that it shall not strike out the words "or otherwise."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question, then, is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] as modified.

Mr. HEYBURN. We accept the amendment, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment will be regarded as agreed to. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is, on page 10, line 5, before the word "State," to insert the word "country;" and in the same line, after the word "place," to insert the word "therein;" so as to read:

Fourth. If the package containing it or its label shall bear any statement, design, or device regarding the ingredients or the substances contained therein, which statement, design, or device shall be false or misleading in any particular, or if the same is falsely branded as to the county, State, Territory, or place therein in which it is manufactured or produced.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is one proposed by Mr. PILES, on page 10, line 13, after the word "section," to insert:

In case of evaporated milk, or so-called "evaporated cream," if the same shall contain 25 per cent solids, of which solids 28 per cent shall be butter fat.

The amendment was rejected.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is one proposed by Mr. LODGE, on page 10, after the word "character," at the end of line 21, to insert "and the amount of alcohol or of opium in any form, if any, contained in them."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is one proposed by Mr. FORAKER, on page 10, line 25, after the word "proprietary," to strike out the word "goods" and insert "foods, drugs, or liquors."

Mr. FORAKER. I ask that that may be passed over until the next amendment offered by me may be voted upon.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment will be passed over for the present.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is one proposed by Mr. LODGE, on page 11, line 4, after the word "imitation," to insert "and to show the amount, if any, of alcohol or of opium in any form contained in them."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. The next amendment is one proposed by Mr. FORAKER, on page 11, line 8, after the word "any," to strike out the word "added."

Mr. HEYBURN. That is objected to, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], which has just been stated.

Mr. FORAKER. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MCCREARY. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment may be again stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be restated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 8, after the word "any," it is proposed to strike out the word "added;" so that, if amended, the paragraph will read:

In the case of liquors, an article shall be deemed adulterated if it contain any ingredient of a poisonous or deleterious character.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HOPKINS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. TALIAFERRO (when Mr. MALLORY's name was called). My colleague [Mr. MALLORY] is absent on account of illness. He has a general pair with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR].

Mr. MARTIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. CULLOM], who is absent. The senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has a general pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. BERRY], who is also absent. If it will be agreeable to the senior Senator from Minnesota, we will transfer our pairs on all votes taken this afternoon, so that the senior Senator from Illinois will stand paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas, and the Senator from Minnesota and I will be at liberty to vote.

Mr. NELSON. That is agreeable to me.

Mr. MARTIN. Under that arrangement I vote "nay."

Mr. DILLINGHAM (when Mr. PROCTOR's name was called). I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. PROCTOR] is necessarily absent from the Senate to-day. He is paired with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. MALLORY]. I shall not make any further announcement of the pair during the remainder of the day.

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK], who is absent. I do not know how, if he were present, he would vote on this amendment, or any other amendment, or on the bill itself. I shall therefore withhold my vote. I make this announcement for the remainder of the day.

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER]. I do not know how he would vote if present; but if I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. PETTUS. I am paired on this bill with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE].

The result was announced—yeas 24, nays 46; as follows:

YEAS—24.

Alger	Clark, Wyo.	Kean	Penrose
Bacon	Depew	Knox	Perkins
Brandegee	Dick	Lodge	Piles
Bulkeley	Elkins	McEnery	Rayner
Burnham	Foraker	Millard	Sutherland

Aldrich	Clarke, Ark.	Hopkins	Proctor
Bailey	Crane	Latimer	Spooner
Berry	Culberson	Mallory	Teller
Burton	Cullom	Morgan	Warner
Carmack	Gorman	Pettus

So Mr. FORAKER's amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 13, after the word "substances," it is proposed by Mr. FORAKER to strike out "and such fact is not plainly stated on the package in which such liquor is offered for sale" and to insert "and the label on the package in which such liquor is offered for sale does not contain the word 'blended' or 'rectified' or 'vatted;'" so as to read:

Such liquors shall be deemed misbranded:

First. It it is blended or rectified, or consists of an admixture of different grades of the same liquor, or contains, or is mixed with, other substances, and the label on the package in which such liquor is offered for sale does not contain the word "blended" or "rectified" or "vatted," or if the label or any written or printed statement accompanying the package in which such liquor is kept or sold contains any false statement as to the character of the contents of such package, or represents such liquor to be the product of any other country than that in which it was actually produced.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], which has just been stated.

Mr. FORAKER. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HOPKINS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER]. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE].

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 33, nays 35, as follows:

YEAS—33.

Alger	Foraker	McEnery	Scott
Bacon	Gallinger	Millard	Stone
Brandegee	Gearin	Nixon	Sutherland
Bulkeley	Hale	Overman	Taliaferro
Burnham	Hemenway	Patterson	Warren

Clark, Wyo.	Knox	Perkins
Dick	Lodge	Platt
Elkins	McCreary	Rayner

NAYS—35.

Allee	Clay	Frye	McLaurin
Allison	Daniel	Fulton	Martin
Ankeny	Dillingham	Gamble	Money
Beveridge	Dolliver	Hansbrough	Nelson
Blackburn	Dryden	Heyburn	Piles
Burkett	Dubois	Kittredge	Simmons
Burrows	Flint	La Follette	Smoot
Carter	Foster	Long	Tillman
Clapp	Frazier	McCumber

NOT VOTING—21.

Aldrich	Crane	Latimer	Spooner
Bailey	Culberson	Mallory	Teller
Berry	Cullom	Morgan	Warner
Burton	Depew	Newlands
Carmack	Gorman	Pettus
Clarke, Ark.	Hopkins	Proctor

So Mr. FORAKER's amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio desire to recur to his proposed amendment on page 10?

Mr. FORAKER. Mr. President, I waive my right to offer that amendment at this time until I see what disposition may be made of an amendment which the Senator from North Dakota will now offer.

Mr. MCCUMBER. On page 11, line 13, after the word "substances," I move to amend by striking out "and such fact" and inserting "and the word blended, rectified, or mixed, as the case may be;" so as to read:

Such liquors shall be deemed misbranded:

First. If it is blended or rectified, or consists of an admixture of different grades of the same liquor, or contains, or is mixed with, other substances, and the word blended, rectified, or mixed, as the case may be, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota will be stated.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Is not that the same as the amendment just voted on?

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

The SECRETARY. On page 11, line 13, after the word "substances," it is proposed to strike out "and such fact," and to insert "and the word blended, rectified, or mixed, as the case may be;" so as to read:

Such liquors shall be deemed misbranded:

First. If it is blended or rectified, or consists of an admixture of different grades of the same liquor, or contains, or is mixed with, other substances, and the word blended, rectified, or mixed, as the case may be, etc.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. The only difference is the use of the word "mixed" instead of "vatted."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ALGER. Following section 3, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. FORAKER. Before we pass from the portion of the bill which has just been amended——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. ALGER] proposes a certain amendment. If the Senator will withhold it until this part of the bill is completed, his amendment will be laid before the Senate.

Mr. ALGER. Very well.

Mr. FORAKER. I now ask that the amendment on page 10, line 25, may be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 10, line 25, after the word "proprietary," it is proposed by Mr. FORAKER to strike out "goods" and insert "foods, drugs, or liquors;" so as to read:

And provided further, That nothing in this act shall be construed as requiring or compelling proprietors or manufacturers of proprietary foods, drugs, or liquors which contain no unwholesome added ingredients to disclose their formulas of production, etc.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 11 of the bill, line 24, it is proposed to strike out "convicted" and insert the word "prosecuted;" so that if amended it will read:

That no dealer shall be prosecuted under the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 12 of the bill, line 22, before the word "Secretary," insert "Secretary of Agriculture or the;" so that it will read:

A sample of such drug, article of food, or liquor to any person duly authorized by the Secretary of Agriculture or the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to receive the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN. I desire to call attention to the fact that the proposed amendment in line 4, page 12, was not agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendments appearing in italics were agreed to on a former occasion.

Mr. HEYBURN. The amendment in line 4 has not been agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was agreed to, as the Chair is advised by the Secretary, on the 10th of January. The next amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 14 of the bill, line 15, before the words "the laws," insert the words "the provisions of this act or;" so that the clause will read:

But such goods shall not be sold in any jurisdiction contrary to the provisions of this act or the laws of that jurisdiction.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. ALGER] proposes an amendment which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 4 so as to read as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Agriculture to fix standards of food products when advisable for the guidance of the officials charged with the administration of food laws and for the information of the courts; and in order that the Secretary of Agriculture may have the best and most scientific advice concerning the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness of preservatives and other substances which are or may be added to foods, he is hereby authorized to appoint a commission of five experts, one of which shall be the Director of the Bureau of Chemistry and Foods, one an expert toxicologist, one an expert bacteriologist, one an expert pathologist, and one an expert physiological chemist, the four members of which commission (apart from the Director of the Bureau of Chemistry and Foods) shall be appointed each for a term of five years, and shall each receive a compensation to be fixed by the Secretary of Agriculture when employed in the work of said commission. It shall be the duty of said commission to meet quarterly in the city of Washington, D. C., and pass upon all questions pertaining to the wholesomeness or unwholesomeness of preservatives and other substances which are or may be added to foods, and to indicate the foods in which preservatives and such other substances may be properly used, the nature of the preservatives and substances to be allowed, and the maximum amount in which they may be employed. The Secretary of Agriculture shall, for the guidance of the courts and food officials, promulgate rules and regulations governing the use of preservatives and such other substances in accordance with the recommendations of this commission; and when the use of a preservative or substance has been so authorized not less than one year's notice shall be given to the public before the same shall be prohibited. No preservative or other substance in use in foods at the time this act goes into effect shall be prohibited until after one year's notice shall be given. The Secretary of Agriculture shall cause public notice to be given of all findings made under the provisions of this section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Michigan.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HEYBURN. Through some inadvertence on page 12, line 4, the words "such article" were substituted for the word "it." The word "it" refers to the act, and the words substituted have no meaning whatever. I move to amend the bill by striking out "such article" and inserting "it."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote by which the amendment was agreed to will be reconsidered, and the amendment will be disagreed to.

The bill is still in the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. MONEY. If the bill is now perfected, I ask for a vote on my substitute.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Mississippi offers a substitute, which will be read.

Mr. FRYE. Is it necessary to have it read? It has been read twice.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the reading will be dispensed with.

Mr. PATTERSON. There are a number of Senators who have no knowledge of what the substitute is, and I think it ought to be read, however long it may be.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from Colorado the proposed substitute will be read.

The Secretary proceeded to read the substitute.

Mr. PATTERSON. There seems to be such a strong protest against consuming time in reading the substitute that I withdraw the request.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Colorado withdraws his request for the reading of the substitute.

The substitute submitted by Mr. MONEY on the 1st instant is as follows: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That it shall be unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation to ship or transport, or deliver for shipment or transportation, from any State or Territory, the District of Columbia, or insular possession, to any other State or Territory, the District of Columbia, insular possession, or to a foreign country, for pay or otherwise, any article of food or drugs which is adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, or not labeled, branded, or tagged as required in section 2 of this act; or to receive in any State or Territory, the District of Columbia, or insular possession, from any other State or Territory, the District of Columbia, insular possession, or from a foreign country, and deliver in the original unbroken package, for pay or otherwise, any article of food or drugs adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, or not labeled, branded, or tagged as required in section 2 of this act; or to introduce into any State or Territory, the District of Columbia, or insular possession, from a foreign country, any article of food or drugs adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act; and any person, firm, or corporation who shall violate any of the provisions of this act shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and be fined not less than $200 for the first offense, and for each subsequent offense be fined not exceeding $360, or imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

SEC. 2. That every person, firm, or corporation who shall ship or transport, or deliver for shipment or transportation, from any State or Territory, the District of Columbia, or insular possession, to any other State or Territory, the District of Columbia, or insular possession, for pay or otherwise, any article of food or drugs, shall securely attach, in a conspicuous place, to every such article of food or drugs, in the form in which it is thus shipped or transported, or delivered for shipment or transportation as aforesaid (whether such form be as one individual article, package, crate, or bundle of packages), a durable label, brand, or tag, upon which shall be printed or written in the English language, so as to be easily discernible, the correct name and address, in some State or Territory, the District of Columbia, or insular possession, of the person, firm, or corporation shipping or transporting the same or delivering the same for shipment or transportation; and no person, firm, or corporation shall be convicted under the provisions of this act for having received in any State or Territory, the District of Columbia, or insular possession, from any other State or Territory, the District of Columbia, insular possession, or from a foreign country, and delivered in original unbroken packages, for pay or otherwise, any article of food or drugs adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act, if said article is labeled, branded, or tagged, in manner and form as required aforesaid, at the time of so receiving and delivering said article: Provided, That any person, firm, or corporation who shall receive in any State or Territory, the District of Columbia, or insular possession, from any other State or Territory, the District of Columbia, insular possession, or from a foreign country, any article of food or drugs not labeled, branded, or tagged, in the manner and form as required herein, shall label, brand, or tag said article with their correct name and address, before delivering the same, for pay or otherwise, in the original unbroken package: And provided further, That any article of food or drugs intended for export shall not be deemed to be adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act when prepared and packed in accordance with the requirements of the laws of the country to which said article is to be shipped, or when prepared and packed in accordance with specifications of the foreign purchaser.

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall organize in the Department of Commerce and Labor a bureau to be known as the Bureau of Foods and Drugs; and it shall be the duty of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to enforce the provisions of this act through the said Bureau of Foods and Drugs; and for that purpose he is hereby authorized to employ such inspectors, clerks, and other employees as may be necessary to enforce the provisions hereof.

SEC. 4. That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall procure, or cause to be procured, through said Bureau of Foods and Drugs, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him necessary to carry into effect the provisions hereof, but not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, samples of articles of food and drugs shipped or transported or delivered for shipment or transportation from any State or Territory, the District of Columbia, or insular possession, to any other State or Territory, the District of Columbia, insular possession, or to a foreign country, or received in any State or Territory, the District of Columbia, or insular possession, from any other State or Territory, the District of Columbia, insular possession, or from a foreign country, and delivered in original unbroken packages, and submit the samples so procured for examination or analysis to the division of chemistry of the hygienic laboratory of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, or to any director or chemist in said laboratory or any branch thereof: Provided, That any inspector, agent, officer, or other person authorized by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to procure samples, as aforesaid, shall, at the time of the taking thereof, notify the person, firm, or corporation so shipping or transporting said article or delivering the same for shipment or transportation, or having received the same, delivering said article in the original unbroken package, as aforesaid, of the purpose for which said sample is taken; and shall then and there tender to said person, firm, or corporation the full selling price of said sample, if said person, firm, or corporation be present to receive said notification or said price; and if said person, firm, or corporation be not present to receive said notification or said price, then said notification and said price shall be sent to said person, firm, or corporation as soon as their address can be ascertained, with reasonable diligence in that behalf, by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, through said Bureau of Foods and Drugs; and said sample shall then and there be divided into three equal parts, and each part sealed with an official seal provided by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor for such purpose; and one of said parts so sealed shall be tendered to the person, firm, or corporation aforesaid, if they be present to receive the same; and if such person, firm, or corporation be not present to receive the same said part shall be immediately sent to them as soon as their address can be ascertained as aforesaid, together with a statement setting forth the time of the taking of said sample and the purpose or purposes for which it was taken; and one of said parts shall be submitted for examination or analysis to the division of chemistry of the hygienic laboratory of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service, as hereinbefore provided for; and one of said parts shall be retained to be delivered to the district attorney of the proper district, if it is found that the provisions of this act have been violated and proceedings are commenced on account thereof on said sample: And provided further, That the person, firm, or corporation receiving a part of said sample, as aforesaid, may have said part analyzed, at their own expense, and submit the results thereof as evidence in any proceedings brought on said sample, provided the chemist or person making such analysis or examination shall appear in said proceedings and testify to the same under oath: And provided further, That in any proceedings under this act the certificate of the chemist making said analysis or examination on behalf of the Government, duly sworn to on oath, shall be prima facie evidence of the facts therein stated, but the defendant shall have the right to cause said chemist to appear and be cross-examined, under oath, in any such proceedings: And provided further, That if the results of the last-named examination or analysis differ materially from the results of the examination or analysis offered in evidence by the defendant the court may, at its discretion, have the part of said sample deposited with the district attorney analyzed or examined by a disinterested chemist or other person, and the whole evidence on the examinations or analyses of the said three parts shall be laid before the court; or the whole evidence on the examinations or analyses of the first two named parts may be laid before the court in the first instance, in the discretion of the court: And provided further, That no proceedings shall be instituted against any person, firm, or corporation, or on any sample procured hereinunder, under the provisions of this act, after the expiration of sixty days from the date of the taking of the sample upon which said proceedings shall be commenced, nor until all the provisions of this act have been fully complied with.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the division of chemistry of the hygienic laboratory of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service to make, or cause to be made, in said laboratory or some branch thereof, with as little delay as possible, examinations or analyses of samples of food or drugs submitted to it, or to any director or chemist in said laboratory or any branch thereof, by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, or any inspector, agent, officer, or other person duly authorized by said Secretary of Commerce and Labor to procure samples and submit the same for such purpose; and the division of chemistry of the hygienic laboratory of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service aforesaid shall furnish to the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, with as little delay as possible, a certificate of the results of such examinations or analyses of such samples submitted as aforesaid, which certificate shall give the results of such examinations or analyses in full and be duly authenticated under oath by the analyst or other person making the same.

SEC. 6. That if it shall appear from any such examination or analysis that any of the provisions of this act have been violated the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall at once certify the facts to the proper United States district attorney, with a copy of the results of the examination or analysis, duly authenticated by the analyst or person making such examination under oath.

SEC. 7. That it shall be the duty of every district attorney to whom the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall report any violation of this act to cause proceedings to be commenced and prosecuted without delay for the fines and penalties in such case provided: Provided, That at any time after any proceedings have been commenced under any of the provisions of this act in any United States court the defendant shall have the right to receive from said district attorney a copy of the results of any examination or analysis which will be offered in evidence against said defendant in said proceedings.

SEC. 8. That any person, firm, or corporation, including their servants, agents, or employees, of whom the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, or any inspector, agent, officer, or other person, duly authorized by the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, shall demand a sample of any article of food or drugs shipped or transported, or delivered for shipment or transportation, from any State or Territory, the District of Columbia, or insular possession, to any other State or Territory, the District of Columbia, insular possession, or to a foreign country; or received in any State or Territory, the District of Columbia, or insular possession, from any other State or Territory, the District of Columbia, insular possession, or from a foreign country, and delivered in original unbroken packages; or introduced into any State or Territory, the District of Columbia, or insular possession, from a foreign country, shall furnish a sample of such article of food or drugs in sufficient quantity for an examination or analysis of the same under the provisions of this act: Provided, That the words "person, firm, or corporation," as used in this section, shall include any person, firm, or corporation who, whether as owner, consignor or consignee, agent or broker, is in the possession of or in any wise entitled to the custody or control of any article of food or drugs demanded for examination or analysis under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 9. That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor may publish from time to time, in like manner as other publications of his Department, bulletins of the work done in enforcing this act, and such other information regarding the same as he may deem proper, to be distributed as public documents in like manner as other publications of his Department: Provided, That the name of any brand, or the name of any manufacturer, person, firm, or corporation, shall not be published in connection with examinations or analyses, or results of examinations or analyses, of articles of food or drugs found to comply with the provisions of this act: And provided further, That the examinations or analyses, or results of examinations or analyses, of articles of food or drugs found to be adulterated or misbranded within the meaning of this act shall not be published, nor the names of any person, firm, or corporation in connection therewith, until the person, firm, or corporation so violating the provisions of this act has been regularly convicted in a proceeding instituted therefor in the proper court and the matter finally adjudicated: And provided further, That the restrictions herein contained shall also apply to the division of chemistry of the hygienic laboratory of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service and every branch thereof.

SEC. 10. That for the purpose of this act the term "food" shall include every article used by man for food, drink, or as a confection or condiment, whether simple, mixed, or compound, other than drugs, and any article which enters into or is used in the composition or preparation of food, as defined herein.

SEC. 11. That for the purposes of this act an article of food shall be deemed adulterated or unwholesome—

First. If any substance or substances has or have been mixed and packed with it and its quality or strength is thereby reduced or lowered or injuriously affected.

Second. If any inferior or cheaper substance or substances has or have been substituted wholly or in part for the article or any natural or necessary constituent or ingredient thereof.

Third. If any valuable or necessary constituents or ingredients of the article have been wholly or in part abstracted from it.

Fourth. If it contains any substance or ingredient, whether added or otherwise, which, in any quantity in which it might reasonably or advantageously be used in food or drink, will injure health; or contains any substance or ingredient which, by chemical combination or otherwise, renders such article of food unwholesome or injurious to the health of the consumer.

Fifth. If it is mixed, colored, coated, polished, or powdered whereby damage or inferiority is concealed; or if by any other means damage or inferiority in such article is concealed.

Sixth. If it is decomposed, putrid, infected, tainted, or rotten, or contains any added decomposed, putrid, infected, tainted, or rotten animal or vegetable substance or article, whether manufactured or not; or if it is the product of a diseased animal or any animal that has died otherwise than by slaughter.

Provided, That an article of food shall not be deemed adulterated or unwholesome in the following cases:

First. Articles having distinctive names of their own, and that are not adulterated within the meaning of the fourth and sixth paragraphs of this section, and that are not misbranded within the meaning of section 12 of this act: Provided, That the term "distinctive name," as used herein, shall mean a name which is not the name of any recognized article of food.

Second. An article of food shall not be deemed adulterated or unwholesome by reason only of being artificially colored with harmless coloring matter if it is plainly stated on the label that said article is colored.

Third. An article of food shall not be deemed adulterated or unwholesome by reason only of the addition of a harmless preservative, or by reason of the addition of any substance for legitimate purposes, or in case of fruits or vegetables by reason of containing any substance or ingredient existing naturally in such fruits or vegetables.

Fourth. That the following preservatives shall not be permissible in greater quantities than the following amounts: Boric acid, one-half of 1 per cent, or its equivalent in borax; sulphurous acid, one-twentieth of 1 per cent, or its equivalent in sodium sulphites; salicylic acid, one-tenth of 1 per cent, or its equivalent in sodium salicylate; benzoic acid, one-fifth of 1 per cent, or its equivalent in sodium benzoate; saltpeter, one-fourth of 1 per cent: Provided, That the name of any substance added to food shall be plainly stated on the label of said article, together with a statement of the purpose or purposes for which said substance is added to such article: And provided, That said substance be applicable for the purpose for which it is added to such article, and not fraudulently added to increase the bulk, weight, or measure of the article: Provided further, That in stating the name of any added substance it shall be in compliance herewith if the trade name only of any proprietary preparation which has been added to food is plainly stated on the label of such article, if said trade name of said proprietary preparation, together with the formula of said preparation, has been placed on file with the Secretary of Commerce and Labor: And provided further, That any formula placed on file with the Secretary of Commerce and Labor under the provisions hereof shall be held by him and treated as private documents of his Department, and be accessible only to himself or duly authorized officers, and the contents thereof held in secrecy, except when necessary to disclose the same in any proceedings brought to enforce the provisions of this act, but the same shall not be otherwise published, nor published outside of said proceedings.

SEC. 12. That for the purposes of this act an article of food shall be deemed to be misbranded—

First. If it be an imitation of or below the standard of the article which it purports to be by the label, or otherwise, on any package, bottle, or receptacle containing such article, or on such article itself.

Second. If it, or any package, bottle, or receptacle containing it, shall, by label, brand, or tag, or otherwise, be deceptive as to its weight or measure, or bear any statement, design, or device regarding the article or the ingredients or substances contained therein, which statement, design, or device shall be false or misleading in any particular; or if the same is falsely labeled, branded, or tagged, either on itself or on any package, bottle, or receptacle containing it as to the State, Territory, or place in which it is manufactured or produced, so that such article shall be deceptive or tend to deceive.

SEC. 13. That this act shall not be construed by any specific standards for food not incorporated herein; but in any proceedings hereinunder the commonly accepted standard for any article of food upon which such proceedings shall have been commenced shall, when not in conflict with the provision of this act, be the guide in determining whether or not the provisions of this act have been violated: Provided, That this section shall not contravene any of the provisions of this act expressly permitting certain added substances in articles of food.

SEC. 14. That the term "drug," as used in this act, shall mean all drugs, medicines, and preparations intended for medical purposes and recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia or the National Formulary as drugs or medicines for internal and external use.

SEC. 15. That for the purposes of this act an article of drugs shall be deemed to be adulterated—

First. If, when a drug intended for medicinal purposes is represented as a drug or medicine under or by a name recognized in the United States Pharmacopœia or the National Formulary as a drug or medicine, it differs from the standard of strength, quality, or purity as determined by the test laid down in the United States Pharmacopœia or the National Formulary official at the time of investigation: Provided, That no drug shall be deemed to be adulterated within the meaning of this provision if the standard of strength, quality, or purity of such drug be plainly stated upon the bottle, box, or other container thereof, although such standard may differ from that determined by the test laid down in the United States Pharmacopœia or the National Formulary.

Second. If its strength or purity fall below the standard it is represented to be: Provided, That an article of drugs shall not be deemed to be adulterated in the following cases: Articles having distinctive names of their own, and that are not misbranded within the meaning of section 16 hereof: Provided, That the term "distinctive name," as used herein, shall mean a name which is not the name of any other article of drugs.

SEC. 16. That for the purposes of this act an article of drugs shall be deemed to be misbranded—

First. If it be an imitation of or below the standard of the article which it purports to be by the label, or otherwise, on any package, bottle, or receptacle containing such article, or on the article itself.

Second. If it, or any package, bottle, or receptacle containing it, shall, by label, brand, or tag, or otherwise, be deceptive as to its weight or measure; or if the same is falsely labeled, branded, or tagged, either on itself, or on any package, bottle, or receptacle containing it, as to the State, Territory, or place in which it is manufactured or produced, so that such article shall be deceptive or tend to deceive.

SEC. 17. That the provisions of this act shall not apply to common carriers, as such, or to persons acting in the capacity of servants, agents, or employees for said common carriers.

Amend the title so as to read: "A bill to regulate commerce in foods, drinks, confections, condiments, and drugs among the States and Territories, the District of Columbia, insular possessions, and foreign countries, and for other purposes."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the substitute submitted by the Senator from Mississippi.

The substitute was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. HEYBURN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ALLISON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN]. I was authorized to vote as I chose on all the amendments, but upon the bill I am paired with him at his request. Were he present, I should vote "yea" and he would vote "nay."

Mr. BAILEY (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay." He is not present, but he has extended me the privilege of voting anyway, and I vote "nay."

Mr. FRAZIER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. He is unavoidably detained from the Chamber. If he were present, I should vote "nay."

Mr. FRYE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. GORMAN], but under its terms I feel at liberty to vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. HOPKINS (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. LATIMER]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. TALIAFERRO (when Mr. MALLORY's name was called). I again announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague, who is paired with the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PROCTOR].

Mr. PETTUS (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. CRANE] on this subject.

Mr. SPOONER (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. CARMACK].

Mr. TELLER (when his name was called). I am paired with the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER]. If he were present, he would vote "yea" and I should vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 63, nays 4, not voting 22, as follows:

YEAS—63.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 22, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, February 21, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 28, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress shall be filled by the reappointment of Richard Olney, a citizen of Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee on Library from further consideration of Senate joint resolution and consider the same. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Senate joint resolution was considered, was ordered to be read the third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. McCLEARY of Minnesota, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the Army appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 14397—the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, pending that motion I would like to see if we can arrange as to the time for general debate. It has been suggested to me by the representative of the minority that debate shall run for four hours on a side, making eight hours of general debate. I ask unanimous consent that there be eight hours of general debate, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to eight hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] and the other half by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL]. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. HULL was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. BOUTELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House in now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

The bill (H. R. 14397) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, the report on the bill is so full that if Members have given attention to it they will see practically all the new legislation incorporated in this measure. There is no question but that many of the provisions that the committee have passed upon favorably are subject to a point of order, but we hoped they would so commend themselves to the judgment of the House that no Member would feel called upon to make the point. The bill carries $69,708,000 in round numbers, being about $1,000,000 less than the same measure carried for the current fiscal year. The estimates were only a little ever $71,000,000, so that there is not a very radical change in the amount asked for by the Department and the amount allowed by the committee. In fact, the committee is rather of the opinion that some of the appropriations asked for by the Department are so small, the cut made by the Secretary was so great, that in all probability a deficiency in the appropriation will exist in the bill as it will pass the House and make necessary additional appropriations.

One of the measures incorporated by the committee will be found on page 5 of the bill, and is as follows:

Provided further, That when the office of Lieutenant-General shall become vacant it shall not hereafter be filled, but said office shall cease and determine.

This is legislation changing the highest office of the military establishment by abolishing it. When the reorganization act was passed the Committee on Military Affairs and the Congress of the United States believed that the officer in command of the Army should have one grade higher than the other officers of the Army, so as to give greater force and effect to his authority as a commanding officer. Of course this committee understands perfectly that under our system of government the President of the United States is at all times and under all circumstances the Commander in Chief of the Army. Since that reorganization act passed creating the grade of Lieutenant-General Congress has adopted another law creating a General Staff, and with that General Staff a Chief of Staff, who is practically at the head of the Army of the United States under the President, and issues the commands to the Army, exercises the controlling influence in its organization and government, and has more power than any other general in the Army.

At the time this law was passed no action was taken in regard to the Lieutenant-General for the reason that it was assumed, and, in fact, stated at the time that the Lieutenant-General would naturally be the chief of staff. Up to this time that has been the case. But, the indications now are, and no one desires to curtail the power of the President in this respect, that for the next few years at least the Lieutenant-General of the Army, if the office shall be continued, will have no power beyond that which can be legitimately exercised either by a brigadier or a major general in charge of a department and really subject to a junior, who will be Chief of Staff, and therefore the head of the military establishment, and receive his orders from a junior in grade and rank.

I do not believe, as one Member of this House, that that is good military organization. In time of war it may frequently be necessary on account of the superior ability displayed on the field by junior officers to assign them to supreme command and place the higher generals on waiting orders, or in independent commands that will not be so particularly under the command of the junior. That this action of the committee has met with the approval of the country at large I am led to believe from the fact that from almost every section of the country I have had commendatory notices sent me of the action. I have one here from the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, in which the matter is very plainly set forth, and I ask that the Clerk may read this as a part of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE LIEUTENANT-GENERAL ABOLISHED.

The House Committee on Military Affairs urges that the grade of Lieutenant-General in the Army be abolished, and the people will sanction this proposition. At the outset the rank meant something, but it has had no significance in recent years. It was well to bestow that rank on Washington, Scott, Grant, Sherman, and Sheridan. Those men rendered service of particular value to the country, but scarcely any of the other wearers of the title deserved any especial honors.

For all the men now on the active roll of the Army the rank of major-general would be high enough to reward them for their deeds. The grade of Lieutenant-General should be reserved for service of especial worth. In the coming time men will appear who will merit that honor. When the crisis comes demanding service of particular value the men will be on hand. This has usually been the case with the United States, although in the second war with England men of that caliber were very slow in making their advent, and, except Jackson, no such man appeared during the whole struggle.

But it was different in the Revolution, in the Mexican war, and in the rebellion. In those conflicts men appeared who made themselves masters of the situation, and they were rewarded, in most cases, for their work. The Spanish war was too short and too small an affair to give much of a chance for the display of military genius, and no genius was displayed, though, as in all wars, there was lots of patriotism and courage at the front. In the wars of the future Grants, Shermans, and Sheridans are likely to be evolved. Let us keep the rank of Lieutenant-General and General for those personages.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, while I do not indorse all that the article says in regard to these generals that are now in the Army, for I think that many of them are as much entitled to this grade, if it were a permanent grade, as any other man that we have had, yet I do believe that the organization of the Army will be better maintained with the abolition grade under the present circumstances than it will be maintained by continuing the office. I want to call the attention of the committee to the further fact, in the line of the article that has just been read, that the Lieutenant-Generals of the Army of the United States from the beginning of the Government are: George Washington, from July 3, 1798, to December 14, 1799; U. S. Grant, March 2, 1864, to July 25, 1866; W. T. Sherman, July 25, 1866, to March 4, 1869; P. H. Sheridan, from March 4, 1869, to June 1, 1878. We had only four Lieutenant-Generals of the Army for almost the first hundred years of the Government. Some men say that General Scott was also a Lieutenant-General, but that is not quite so. He had the pay and allowances of a Lieutenant-General without being commissioned of that rank. He was retired on that pay, but never was commissioned and confirmed as a Lieutenant-General.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. HULL. Oh, yes.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I desire to ask the gentleman if he indorses that portion of his speech which he has inserted in the form of an editorial?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I stated specifically that I did not.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Then what is the particular object in slandering the officers of the Army in this indirect way?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I shall try to answer that if it is necessary before I get through, if the gentleman calls it slander. I do not, and if he will read my remarks he will not. It is not the fault of the officers that the Spanish war was a small affair.

Mr. GROSVENOR. This is slanderous in the fullest degree.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, since 1888 we have had J. M. Schofield, February 8, 1895, to September 29, 1895. Only a short time before he went out of office he was made a Lieutenant-General. We have also had Nelson A. Miles from June 6, 1900, to August 8, 1903; S. B. M. Young, August 8, 1903, to June 9, 1904; A. R. Chaffee, January 9, 1904, to February 1, 1905; J. C. Bates from February, 1905, to be retired, as I understand, in April, 1906.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chaffee is not a Lieutenant-General now.

Mr. HULL. He is retired. He is on the retired list. I am talking about the active list. General Schofield is still a Lieutenant-General on the retired list. General Young is still a Lieutenant-General on the retired list.

There is one thing, Mr. Chairman, that I think I can say without slander to anybody, and that is that the war with Spain has made more Lieutenant-Generals than all the other wars that the Republic has engaged in. Now, I suppose that my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] might say that that is slander. To my mind it is simply stating the truth—not the fault of the men and nothing against the men; it was the organization provided for by Congress that has brought it about. If I had my way in the organization of the Army, I would provide that every President when he goes into office may designate a Chief of Staff to serve during the pleasure of the President, and that while so serving he should have the rank and pay and allowance of a Lieutenant-General, and that we would have no retired Lieutenant-Generals, for the reason that it would only be on temporary pay, the same as you have for your officer here in Washington in charge of public buildings and grounds.

We have a law which provides that while he is serving in such capacity he shall have the rank, pay, and allowance of a colonel. He may be a captain or a lieutenant or any officer below the grade of a colonel whom the President may select, but while so serving he shall be a colonel. That would always insure two things: It would insure the President selecting a man with whom he could work in perfect harmony in the organization, control, and direction of the Army; and the other that a man having that power while so serving would have a higher grade than those whom he would command—something which I believe good military discipline demands at all times, that the higher grade should command the lower grade and never the lower grade command the higher.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I confess to a lack of knowledge respecting the organization of the Army. Under the law now does the title of lieutenant-general go to the senior major-general?

Mr. HULL. Not necessarily. It goes to the man appointed by the President.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And at the same time the President has power to select a chief of staff who is the real head of the Army?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And the title of lieutenant-general carries with it only the titular headship and not the real headship of the Army.

Mr. HULL. That is correct, unless he is also made chief of staff.

Mr. KEIFER. As you are being interrupted now, will the gentleman allow a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. HULL. I do.

Mr. KEIFER. For simply one question. I want to know if the gentleman remembers when the law was passed that made the office of Lieutenant-General a continuous one?

Mr. HULL. I think it was the act of February 1, 1901, the act reorganizing the Army. Not having the data before me I may not have the exact date. Now, I want to say to this committee that some of the men who, in the judgment of many Members, would fill the office of Lieutenant-General of the Army with distinguished honor have not had this position yet, and if the House rejects the provision they may have it in the near future. I am willing to say to the House and the country that, in my judgment, no man who has held that position for the last five years is more entitled to it than some of those men who are now behind and are coming into the higher office if it is not abolished; but in my view of the situation, and the Committee on Military Affairs agrees in this, the time has come to commence action for the abolition of this office in the interest of the Army and of the Government, and I hope that the Committee of the Whole House will retain this provision in the bill. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. PRINCE] will later address the House on the retired list much more fully than I propose to do at this time. We have another little amendment here to which I want to call your attention and that is in regard to the amount that is deducted from the pay of retired enlisted men of the Regular Army for the support of the National Home in Washington. On page 6, line 8, the committee has inserted this proviso:

Provided further, That so much of section 4819, Revised Statutes, as requires that 12½ cents per month be deducted from the pay of retired enlisted men of the Army and passed to the credit of the commissioners of the Soldiers' Home in the District of Columbia, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

I was personally in favor, Mr. Chairman, of repealing that whole section and not having the dollar and a half a year taken out of the salary—of the pay—of the private soldiers of our Regular Army. There has been built up by this system a great Home of seven or eight hundred acres of land, large buildings, and expensive administration, by the pittance taken from the Regular Army itself.

There has been nothing appropriated by Congress that I can now recall. Very few soldiers of the Regular Army know that the money is taken out. They know that there are deductions for different things when they come to adjust their pay, and the testimony before the committee was that hardly one in ten, hardly one in fifty, knew that they were paying it, and therefore it did not hurt them any; but when a man is getting $13 a month, when there is not one in a thousand who can receive a particle of benefit from it, when this Government is strong and rich and great, and cares for its volunteer soldiers so splendidly, allowing their pension while inmates of the Home, while we are taking this small pittance from the Regular Army until we have accumulated a fund of $4,000,000 which has been taken out of their pay, it does seem to me that the time has come when this Government should take control of that $4,000,000 in the administration of this Home. It is now administered by the War Department, and, of course, that is in one sense Government administration; but this Congress should take charge of it, look after its expenditures, look after its Regular Army soldiers as it does the volunteers, and appropriate the necessary amount to maintain it. But we were afraid of the point of order, and so we agreed to an amendment only repealing the section so far as it applies to the enlisted men on the retired list.

He gets three-quarter pay after thirty years' service. He has no show on earth to ever get any benefit from the Home, and yet the Government for the last fifty years has been taking from this little pittance of three-quarters of a private soldier's pay a dollar and a half a year, devoting it to charity that he can not under any conditions or circumstances ever hope to receive one dollar of benefit from.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Why can not he receive it?

Mr. HULL. Because he is not eligible to admission.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Who are eligible?

Mr. HULL. Those who are discharged for injuries may be admitted to the Home. Now, it seems to me no man will raise the question as to repealing the law letting these old men, who have served their Government thirty years in the ranks, at least enjoy the little pittance the Government gives, which is not half as much as many of the pensions, and, in fact, not a quarter as much as some of the pensions that are given. So that I hardly think that any Member here will object to that. The retired officers of the Army serve there, and I have no doubt serve well. They get their full pay while serving, as well as their quarters. The increase pay is from the funds contributed by the enlisted men. It is all paid by the private soldier. And I am addressing myself to this question now more with the hope that in the near future the Congress of the United States will by appropriate legislation take from the present organization this Home and place it under the control of the Congress of the United States, and relieve the private soldiers from the burden of keeping up a Home that not one in a thousand can ever hope to enter. I think the $4,000,000 would very nearly support it now under proper management.

There is another matter that the committee has entered into legislation upon in connection with the pay of enlisted men that I desire to call your attention to and that the committee believed to be of very great value to the Government. It reads as follows:

Provided, That hereafter enlisted men qualifying as expert riflemen shall receive, in addition to their pay, $3 per month; those qualifying as sharpshooters, $2 per month, and those qualifying as marksmen, $1 per month, under such regulation as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

There was a time in the history of this Government when nearly every man was a sharpshooter. That was when the frontier was being developed, when there was an abundance of game, when men lived nearer to nature than they do to-day. Then we were the greatest nation of sharpshooters on earth. Probably no nation has ever approached us in the use of the rifle except the men of South Africa. To-day, with our large cities and our dense population, the skill in the use of firearms has practically gone out. The Government has taken some steps in the erection of rifle ranges and throwing them open to the militia, in the passing of appropriations giving medals and trophies for expert riflemen, to stimulate rifle practice in the United States.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is no special inducement to bring members of the Regular Army to qualify as marksmen. The present law gives $1 a month without dividing into classes. This increases the compensation as they show the greater skill, and in my judgment will be of as much benefit to us if in the future we have war as any provision we can enact. It is not enough to have a man who can carry a gun to be effective in war. It is the man that can shoot straight, that has become so familiar with his gun and its capacity that when he aims at a certain point he will reach the mark that makes an army effective. When this question was up a few years ago my colleague from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] called attention to one battle where this was shown in such a marked degree, namely, the battle of New Orleans. There the backwoodsmen, the man with his squirrel rifle, the man who had had a gun from the time he was able to carry it until he reached manhood, and had become familiar with its use, was pitted against the best-trained troops of Europe.

You all remember that there never has been in the history of any battle such marvelous execution as that done by the force under General Jackson as against the force of the British in the battle of New Orleans in the war of 1812. I believe that marksmanship should be stimulated in the Army. It is estimated it will cost the Government $76,000 a year to do this work, but while that is true, we believe that the appropriation that is carried in the bill is sufficient to meet that increased expense without further increasing the amount carried by the bill, and for this reason—that the amount appropriated is for the full number authorized by law in the Army. But there is always a shortage in the enlisted force. For instance, to-day we have a shortage of over 4,000——

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will allow me to ask him this question. If a man qualifies as a marksman, how long does he get the extra pay?

Mr. HULL. I suppose as long as he continues in the service and keeps up his practice.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Must he qualify at different dates?

Mr. HULL. It is all under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe; and the report of his company commander will determine how long the extra pay will continue. I should think it would not continue at all unless he continued to be an expert marksman.

I was speaking about shortage. We have great difficulty in enlisting men for the artillery. There is no trouble in enlisting the number authorized by the direction of the President, not the full number authorized by law, because the law allows the President to increase the number from 60,000 to 100,000, if, in his discretion, it should become necessary. But there now is a shortage of over 4,000 in the artillery, largely in the coast-defense arm of the Government, because we have largely specialized the work there. A man who serves a three-year enlistment in the Coast Artillery becomes a pretty fair electrician, and when his term of service is out he can get two or three times as much pay from electrical companies as he can secure from the Government. Therefore we are always having difficulty in keeping our force for the Coast Artillery even sufficient to do the necessary work in this arm of the service.

We have a bill before us, Mr. Chairman, which, while not largely increasing the pay of the artillery, not increasing it as a whole, does increase the pay of certain noncommissioned officers of the company, and thereby we hope perhaps more of them will remain, after becoming experts, on our giving them larger pay than is now provided by law. It will not cost the Government very much more money and will obviate the difficulty we have now in securing artillerymen. It will hang up a prize for every man to strive for. That is not in this bill. I would be in favor of enacting some law that would give to the militia of the States on the seacoast such inducements for enlistment as would provide a strong reserve of artillerymen in case of war.

Whenever we have war we would have to increase our force enormously, especially for the Coast Artillery, because if the entire 18,000 now authorized by law were enlisted it would not furnish one shift of men to the gun. It would be no effective force at all. It would not even furnish one shift of men. The Committee on Appropriations have very properly gone along and appropriated for coast defenses from year to year, and if the plan now proposed is carried through a large sum of money will be expended in the future and a very large increase of our defenses will be made. These defenses are absolutly worthless unless you train men to take charge of the guns and handle them in case of need. All that the service is doing to-day practically is to keep the guns oiled and cleaned, and it would require a very great deal larger force to practice the use of the guns.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Iowa allow me to ask him a question on that subject? What is the reason that there is not an available force sufficient to man the guns of the coast defenses? Is it in the law or is it a lack of ability to secure recruits for that service?

Mr. HULL. It is lack of ability to secure recruits. I will say to the gentleman that you can get men to enlist in the infantry and cavalry. You can get men who will be attracted by the pomp and circumstance of war in time of peace. They wear the uniform, are part of the parades, they march, and are part of an attractive pageantry, but the man who enlists in the Coast Artillery wears overalls half of the time. He is a laboring man, skilled in mechanism, and it does not appeal to the imagination of young men to go into that class of work at present wages.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Is it in the power of the War Department to detail men from the infantry or cavalry to the coast-defense service?

Mr. HULL. I should say not if they specifically enlist for a certain branch of the service. If it is a general enlistment for service in the Army of the United States, I should imagine they could be detailed to the artillery.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Missouri?

Mr. HULL. I do.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask two or three questions. This bill provides for abolishing the rank of Lieutenant-General in the Army, does it not?

Mr. HULL. It does?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does this bill make any provision for mustering that Porto Rican regiment out of the service?

Mr. HULL. It does not. I will say to the gentleman that by the law which was agreed to two years ago the Porto Rican regiment expires by limitation of law in two years more.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. When does it expire?

Mr. HULL. Two years from now—the 30th of June, 1908, as I remember. I may be mistaken as to the date, but I am not mistaken as to the fact that when that question was before Congress, and was fought over here, a compromise was finally reached between the House and the Senate. The Senate wanted to continue the Porto Rican regiment as a permanent part of the Army. The House wanted to abolish it entirely. A compromise was finally reached that in four years from that time there should be no Porto Rican regiment; that it should cease to exist.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, is there any provision in this bill increasing the term of enlistment of the Porto Rican regiment?

Mr. HULL. No, sir; not at all. It has not been asked for from the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it liable to be put into the bill?

Mr. HULL. I should say not by the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I saw where the Secretary of War had changed base on the subject, and was asking that the term of enlistment of that regiment be lengthened.

Mr. HULL. The House committee has had no document of that kind. I saw in the paper, as a matter of news, that such a request had been sent to the Senate.

Mr. SLAYDEN. If the gentleman from Iowa will yield to me, I want to say to my friend from Missouri that former Secretary of War Root, while he was Secretary of War, expressed himself as of the opinion that it would be to the advantage of the Government to discontinue this regiment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What I saw in the paper was that the Secretary of War had asked the committee to extend the length of service of this Porto Rican regiment. Now, it turns out that Secretary Root was in favor of abolishing it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. But I wish also to say to the gentleman from Missouri that Secretary Root changed front on that question finally.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. He changed over, too?

Mr. SLAYDEN. Yes; finally.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It is a very mysterious sort of a performance that gets them to change all the time.

Mr. HULL. There is another proposition in the bill, on page 14, that is legislation. It is contained in line 14, to and including line 17:

Provided further, That hereafter no officer holding a rank above that of colonel shall be retired on his own application until he shall have served at least one year in such rank.

The intention of that provision is plainly to avoid giving men a promotion simply to get them out of the way. In other words, to promote a man to-day and retire him to-morrow on his own application. The committee believes that a man who is entitled to promotion to the grade of a brigadier-general ought, unless his time expires by limitation of law, to be compelled to serve one year in that grade before he is retired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That will not affect an officer who becomes entitled to promotion to-day and entitled by operation of law to retirement to-morrow?

Mr. HULL. It does not affect him at all.

Mr. KEIFER. Why not?

Mr. HULL. Because it says "on his own application." It does not affect him at all. It simply cuts off the gristmill, through officers coming and saying, "If you will give me the grade of brigadier I will retire." If a man is entitled to be a brigadier-general and he has yet remaining years of service to the Government under the law, he ought to perform that service, and not be a charge upon the Government simply to get him to retire.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee if he can tell us to what extent that custom has prevailed?

Mr. HULL. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. PRINCE, my colleague on the committee, will make, as I understand, a full statement on that subject. I have not gone into the subject with such detail that I could possibly answer the gentleman's question.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It has, in the judgment of the gentleman from Iowa, prevailed to some extent?

Mr. HULL. My understanding is that within the last three weeks three men have been promoted from the grade of lieutenant-colonel to that of brigadier-general with their agreement to immediately retire. Now, the minute a man becomes a brigadier-general he is above the grade of colonel, and the very minute he becomes that he has under this provision no right to apply for retirement until he shall have served one year. With all respect to my friend from Ohio, I think it covers that. He does not retire as lieutenant-colonel, and he can not agree as a lieutenant-colonel to retire as a brigadier-general and make it binding. He must retire after he gets to the grade of brigadier-general, and if he applies for retirement under that grade he must serve one year.

We have incorporated in the bill a provision for maneuvers this year. I want to take a little time of the House on that. Ordinarily I prefer to debate and discuss a bill under the five-minute rule, but the House is in such circumstances now that I am not trespassing on the patience of the House by taking all the time I want under general debate.

We provide, without taking time to look it up in the bill, an appropriation of $700,000 to enable the militia to participate in the maneuvers this year. The provision will be found on page 22, lines 11 to 20, inclusive.

We had a supplemental estimate sent to us asking for $1,200,000, in round numbers, for the purpose of permitting the militia to participate in these maneuvers. There seems to be a little cross purpose and a little misunderstanding between the War Department and the committee on this appropriation. The War Department claims that they intended their estimates not for the militia, but for the Regular Army, and yet in the estimate it was specifically stated that it was for the militia. The Assistant Secretary of War was before the committee, and in the hearings this language was used by him:

> What is proposed is that you should give us a moderate appropriation to permit such regiments of the National Guard as may be recommended by the governors of the States, and as may be approved by the Secretary of War, to go to these camps of the Regular Army that are to be established and take part with them, if they desire to, in the exercises they may have there. For instance, if there is a permanent camp in the center of Indiana or Iowa for two or three months, the regiments of the adjoining States which have proved themselves at previous State camps to be efficient can be ordered there for ten days, or whatever time they can spare—two or three regiments at a time. And they will have a very much better education by observing the regular troops in these camps than they could obtain in any other way. There is no one so eager to learn as the National Guardsmen, and they learn much by observation.

We cut the appropriation from $1,200,000 to $700,000. It is proposed by the Department, and I think wisely, to establish at least seven camps of instruction for regular troops this year. They are to be marched from their permanent quarters to places where the camps are to be held. For instance, those of Iowa and Missouri would probably be marched—I am speaking of the Regulars—to Fort Riley, Kans., where, I understand, one of the camps is to be held. The seven camps established throughout the country will bring it in reach of a very large portion of the militia. It is not proposed to have the maneuvers as they were the last time, and thus have the $700,000 expended in only five days' exercises. They propose to have at least three months with the Regular Army, living in camp and marching to and from the places of destination. It will be a great school of instruction for the Regulars and of marvelous advantage to the militia.

Now, I want to call the attention of the House to the fact that under the present condition of the Department the amount carried by this bill may not pay the extra expenses of the Regular Army. It is supposed that the Department will go to another branch of this Congress and ask for an increase in the appropriation for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the Regular Army. I do not want the committee to feel that we may not be called upon—I do not say that we will give it—but that we may be called upon later to increase the amount.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that at this time, with the present conditions existing all over the world, that we should give to our great reserve—the National Guard—the very highest instruction that it is possible to extend to them. We have never in this country depended on the Regular Army for the main fighting line. There has never been a war of any magnitude in this country where the country was not compelled to rely on its citizen soldiers for maintaining itself on the battlefield.

The Regular Army is, however, just as much a volunteer force as the National Guard, in some cases more, because every man that enlists in the Regular Army does so upon his own motion, subscribes his own name, gives his own certificate of character before he can enter the Army at all, so that he is practically a volunteer; but we designate them regulars and volunteers for the convenience of carrying them in our minds. I hope, as does every other Member of this House, that we will have no trouble in the near future that will call for the use of an armed force, but there are conditions existing to-day in the Orient that may make it necessary for us, in order to preserve our prestige, our power, and our rights, to employ force and show that we are ready, if necessary, to fight for them. I think that in some respects that has been brought about by the injudicious utterances of the gentleman who represents this country at the court of Peking. I am not very familiar with diplomatic usages, but have regarded silence in foreign affairs as golden. I have here a letter sent me from China some months ago, inclosing a clipping from a newspaper published in November, that I would like very much to have the House indulge me in hearing while the Clerk reads the same. I send it to his desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

THE BOYCOTT.

PEKING, November 30, 1905.

The American minister (Mr. Rockhill) has paid a visit to H. E. Na Tung, president of the Waiwupu, and reminded him that the United States of America intend to pay back the sum of £20,000,000, their share of the Boxer indemnity, and that a bill to that effect is to be placed before Congress, but that the anti-American boycott movement has displeased the Members of Congress and made it difficult to pass the bill.

H. E. Na Tung in answer said the Chinese Government had already issued orders to stop the anti-American movement and is endeavoring to establish more intimate relations between the two nations; also that many Chinese wish to proceed to the United States, and therefore it is desirable that the American Government shall extend more liberal treatment to enable Chinese to enter America.

It is understood that the Chinese Government is really rather pleased with the effect of the anti-American movement. (Special service.)

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that the representative of this Government had a proper conception of the character of the Chinese people when he offered them a bribe of £20,000,000, or any sum supposed to represent this Government's part of the Boxer indemnity, to be good. They are a people that, in my judgment, would take any such offer as that as an indication of our being rather more afraid of them than otherwise, and it seems to me that a man occupying his position should have let whatever information was necessary come from the Government of the United States direct, and not give it to the newspapers. I have here a letter from a man who talks the Chinese language and is well acquainted with the characteristics of the people. I read:

CHINA, December 4, 1905.

Hon. J. A. T. HULL, Washington.

DEAR CAPTAIN HULL: The above clipping reminds me of a matter concerning which I have been minded to write you for some time. Knowing the Chinese as those of us do who live among them, we can not but feel that it would be a great mistake on the part of our Government to return the Boxer indemnity money to them, especially at this time. For after all is said and done, the candid man must admit that the Chinese, judged by all recognized canons of civilization, are but partially civilized. And the longer men live here among them the more thoroughly convinced must they be of the truth of this statement. The great rank and file of the people (and it must be of them by which we judge a people) know but little of any law between man and man, and between one nation and another, other than the law of might. Nor are the people so much to blame for this condition, for from the cradle to the grave this conception is ground into them by their system of government and by the abuses of the governing classes. Deeds of gratitude, of magnanimity, or charity they practice but little, nor do they know how to appreciate such. According to their codes and manner of thought, such deeds are signs of weakness, and hence gratitude is seldom found among them.

The Boxer indemnity was demanded of the Chinese as compensation in some degree for the unheard-of and diabolical outrages upon the American minister and his family, upon the American missionaries and their families, the slaughter of innocent women and children, and the destruction of property owned by American citizens by the Chinese people. Nor was the amount of the indemnity thus demanded, according to the standards of the most enlightened Chinese, thought to be at all too great. They had sought by all the powers of their might to annihilate the foreigners in China, but being sorely defeated they accepted the inevitable with astonishing equanimity.

Moreover at the culmination of this crisis a strong movement was set on foot by certain of the more powerful European nations to divide up the Chinese Empire among the various nations whose commercial interests were large in China by way of punishing the Chinese. And it is freely admitted on all sides now that the plan failed; that had it not been for the strong attitude of the American Government, through its late Secretary of State, the whole scheme would have succeeded and the Chinese Empire would have been no more. And for this service on the part of America toward China, what has China given in return? The boycott of Americans and American goods, the villainous attack on Admiral Train and his officers, and the dastardly crime at Lienchow. And these are only typical illustrations of the Chinese conceptions of gratitude.

And now on top of all this it is proposed in certain quarters to pay back the Chinese indemnity to the Chinese Government. For what purpose or to what end it is most difficult for those of us who live here to conceive. The moment the American Government pays back a penny of that indemnity it will lose what little remaining respect the Chinese have for America. They will take the money—Oh, yes—very gladly; but then they will turn about, laugh us to scorn, because they can not appreciate our leniency and patience or our generosity. Just as long as a Chinese can make you think he is your friend, and get you to act toward him as your friend, just so long will he take every advantage of you; "for," he reasons, "he is my friend, and as such he will not give me any trouble so long as I can keep him in a good humor." Who in the past few years have obtained most of the commercial privileges in China? Has it been America, with her lenient and indulgent policy? Never. Rather it has been England, Germany, France, and Japan, who, when they want anything of the Chinese, simply demand it, and keep demanding until they get what they want. America, by reason of her golden-rule policy, has, instead of reaping commercial or other advantages, reaped a whirlwind in which the boycott, the Lien-Tchou massacre, the Admiral Train incident, the Hankow-Canton Railway squabble, and the prevalent strong anti-American attitude of the Chinese are the main features.

Better a thousandfold keep the Boxer indemnity, and besides using a part of it in building three or four battle ships against the not very far off need of them, if our position in the Orient is to be maintained, to use the remainder in purchasing adequate grounds and buildings for the American consulates in China. Of all the nations represented in China the American consulate quarters are the poorest and meanest. Little wonder that a people who are so greatly influenced by display and grandeur as are the Chinese should look with somewhat of contempt upon a nation that persists in maintaining such miserable consular establishments as does America in China.

But with a part of the Boxer indemnity money America could purchase suitable sites and erect buildings thereon for all its consular establishments in China, and thus take a great step toward regaining the confidence and respect of the Chinese people. Nor would this be in anywise unjust to the Chinese people, for all such money spent in China would naturally find its way into the pockets of Chinese laborers, merchants, and landholders. And in this manner may the indemnity be sent back to China under conditions the most advantageous to all parties concerned.

Suppose, however, that the money is turned back to the Chinese in toto, what will become of it? About 99 per cent will find lodgment in the "squeeze" pocket of the Chinese mandarins, and the poor, deluded people will never receive a penny's worth of value from it. And this same will be true, even though the American Government stipulates that the money must be used in the erection of public school buildings and hospitals. How is the American Government to supervise the erection of such buildings and the expenditure of that money in China?

However, the amount of money in question is a very handsome sum, and if it be found necessary to return a part of it, then enough ought to be kept back to procure suitable consulates throughout China if America hopes to enter upon that much talked and dreamed of "commercial conquest of the Orient." Republican simplicity and plainness is all right at home, where everybody is accustomed to it, but there is nothing attractive or respect begetting in it to the mind of the luxuriant oriental. Our consulates and our consular service should, at least, make as good a showing in China as do those of Great Britain and Germany if we are to keep up with those countries in the race for commercial supremacy in the Orient. And now that the opportunity presents itself to remedy one of the most serious defects in our service in China it ought not by any means be allowed to pass without grasping it.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to know who it was that made that talk referred to in the newspaper clipping.

Mr. HULL. The minister of this country to Peking.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I would like to ask the gentleman if there has been any investigation or inquiry to determine whether that dispatch is entirely correct?

Mr. HULL. I have no doubt about that.

This gentleman goes very fully into matters, closing up with the statement that he believes it would be better for this Government to take the boxer indemnity, if we have no other use for it, and build battle ships to maintain our power in the Orient. I am inclined to think that he is right and that we should not stop our work on new ships.

Mr. SIBLEY. Who is the author of that letter?

Mr. HULL. I prefer not to give his name, for it may do him some harm. Another proposition in connection with this that is set forth in this letter and one or two others I have had from China is the charge that the Government of Japan is stirring up trouble. I desire to say to you, Mr. Chairman, that I have made some investigation along that line, and I do not believe that there is one word of truth in that proposition. The merchants of Japan and the merchants of several of the European governments when this trouble first originated were delighted to see the American boycott extend, because they were rivals in trade, but as the fire spread it was found out that they would be hit equally with us, and now they themselves—the merchants—are opposed to further agitation along that line. The Japanese Government is guided by far-seeing men—men, in my judgment, of great ability, men of great patriotism—and Japan is interested to-day in peace in the Orient, so that they may be able to build up and develop the splendid empire they are developing there, and the Government of Japan will, in my judgment, be one of the strong factors in preventing trouble between the western nations and China.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. China is not a military power, in the modern sense of war. A Chinaman rather regards a soldier in the light of an executioner, and I do not think, for one, that China will ever become a military power. Attempts have recently been made, however, to organize the military system according to modern standards, and if they should succeed in doing it, does the gentleman think that we will be able to cope with them on their own territory? The fact is that China would be able to bring on foot within a very short time a million and a half of soldiers. It would be a physical impossibility, in my judgment, to transport even 100,000 men across the ocean, and therefore such a question is out of the range of all possibilities.

Mr. HULL. Well, Mr. Chairman, I only know this one fact, and that is of such common knowledge that every man here is possessed of it, that to-day there have been grave questions confronting us in our dealings with this old Empire. The gentleman very truly says China has not been for the past two thousand years a military nation, but it is also true that western ideas, western progress, and western influence has been meddling and meddling with this great old people for so many years that they may finally awake to a sense of their great power; and it is also a matter of common knowledge to-day that she is under the instruction of competent officers, largely increasing her military power; and I only hope that as she increases her military power and comes in touch with the progress of the twentieth century as exemplified in the western world, as her neighbor, Japan, has done, she will also increase in broad-minded civilization that will recognize the rights of all the world while being able to defend her own right. But she is in a transition period now if she is awakening, and while that is going on every government that has business relations with China must be ready to protect their interests at all hazards or else pull down their flag, leave the Pacific Ocean, and abandon their trade.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman permit me to say one word at that point in line with what has been said by the gentleman from Missouri? The most significant thing I heard in the Orient while with the Taft party last summer was said by a Chinese official in a conversation on the railway running out from Canton. I spoke to him of our visit to Japan and of the wonderful things which that nation has been doing. He replied, Yes; that Chinamen had been studying Japan; that they knew what she had been doing and how she had succeeded in accomplishing these wonderful results, and he said: "I assure you that China is going to turn over"—that was his expression—"to turn over." I said to him that his words had tremendous meaning if they meant that China is to adopt modern methods in business and warfare, and he answered: "I mean what I say." He was so much in earnest—usually they are very quiet and calm in conversation—that he struck on the window sill of the car with his hand like this, and said: "I assure you China is going to turn over. Powerful influences are opposing the movement, but China is going to turn over." Within a week after we landed in San Francisco I saw, what all of you remember to have read, a dispatch saying that China had organized an infantry establishment of a million or more of men, to be drilled by Japanese and Chinese officers educated largely in German military schools.

Mr. HULL. Well, Mr. Chairman, I have no doubt that is all true, and I can only again express the hope that when China does come to an awakening to modern ideas, modern thoughts, and modern progress it may have the same effect upon her people that it has had upon Japan, and in place of being a menace to the world it may cause them to join in the great advance of humanity everywhere for the uplifting of civilization and the protecting of the rights of men. [Applause.] Japan only a little more than fifty years ago was a kingdom as far back in all the ideas of modern progress as China is to-day. Many people might think that when it was aroused and organized it would become a menace to the civilization of the western world. I do not believe that has been the result, and I believe that the splendid progress Japan has made in a little over half a century will make for peace in the Orient during the next twenty-five years and will make for the rights of men and for the rights of commerce and for the rights of all parties having interests there for at least a quarter of a century to come. Now, while I am on that, I was quoted last year as saying that Japan was a great menace to us. I had almost forgotten it. I had letters from all over the world congratulating me on my farsightedness. I got more reputation by what I never said than I have in all my life from what I have said. [Applause.] I have never believed we were in any immediate danger and I hope never will be in any danger of a conflict with Japan. I did say that it was necessary to maintain a large Navy, since we had our possessions from Porto Rico to the Philippine Islands, across this continent, reaching to the very gate or the door of China and a next-door neighbor to Japan, with a marvelous increase of trade that has come to the Pacific Ocean, for I believe the power that controls the Pacific Ocean for the next century will largely control the commerce of a greater part of the world. [Applause.] I said I did believe that if we were to ever have trouble with any nation there and Japan was against us, we would require a strong Navy and a well-equipped Army to maintain our possessions, and I stand by that yet.

And I want to say in passing that while I have largely to do with the Army, I have the most profound admiration for the Navy of the United States. And I am willing, as one Member of this House to say that every Congress should see at least one battle ship started, until our Navy is equal to all the demands that may come to us under all the crises of the future. [Applause.] I am glad that Japan got into this discussion enough for me to set myself right on the other proposition, and I hope the men that wrote to me from Europe and other parts of the world will not see my remarks now, as I would be delighted to retain their good will for farsighted statesmanship, even if not fully entitled to it.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The gentleman says that the nation that controls the Pacific Ocean will control largely the commerce of the world?

Mr. HULL. The commerce of the greater part of the world. I did not say of the world.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Is it the gentleman's idea that commerce follows the fleet or follows the battle ship?

Mr. HULL. Well, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts, living upon the seaboard, should know more about that than I, because until I was old enough to enlist in the Army of the United States and be sent at the expense of the Government to the Gulf, I never saw anything bigger than a little Mississippi steamer or a prairie schooner taking a family across Iowa. [Laughter.] I will say this, that judging by the nations who have accomplished great results in commerce, judging by the fact that England, confined on land to her little isle, has reached out and has her coaling stations in every sea and her flag in every port, is the greatest commercial factor of the world; and if she had been content to house herself up on her island without establishing her great navy, without building up her great merchant marine, she would have been so insignificant and poor to-day that no part of the world would do her honor.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. The gentleman is aware that Holland without any great fleet, possesses a large part of the commerce of the world.

Mr. HULL. Holland has been a seafaring power, and used to be a great naval power, and she was such until she got her carrying trade and great wealth in her ships. And she would not have that if she had not been a great naval power to begin with.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. But to-day Holland is not a great naval power, and to-day she possesses a large share of the commerce of the world. I would like that——

Mr. HULL. I suppose next to England.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I would like to ask the gentleman——

Mr. HULL. I would say to the gentleman now, right on that point, further, that it seems to me the demand for good coaling stations and bases of supplies in all parts of the world is greater to-day than it was even when England reached out and took them. In those good old days a man commanding a ship depended on wind to get his vessel through the water. He could sail for months and months and months, reaching into years, if his food supplies held out, without having to land. To-day, with steam as a factor, it is necessary with these great ocean liners, it is necessary with your warships, to have coaling stations at certain points, else your vessel is utterly worthless.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. I agree with the gentleman that under present conditions we must have coaling stations. If his idea is that the larger fleet you have the larger your commerce is going to be, then it would follow on the gentleman's theory that if we were to get the commerce of China we must establish a fleet large enough to overcome the Japanese fleet.

Mr. HULL. I think the gentleman has misunderstood me to some extent. I said we would control that ocean, and I believe that we would control the commerce of a large part of the world. I still assert that. I do not say that we have got to do it by war. I hope my good friend and myself will not live to see another war between civilized nations of the world. But I do believe this, just as the present Chief Executive has so often said, that the best way on earth to avoid war is to always be ready for it. We have not reached the point yet when mankind is so unselfish that it would give up any right that it can hold by force. What has preserved the peace of Europe since the war of 1870 between France and Germany? The fact that every nation has stood there, ready to make war too costly for any nation to engage in it.

If the time can come when all the nations in the world can disarm at once it will be better, but I do not believe that the lion and the lamb are going to lie down together while I remain upon the earth.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Is it not because the nations of the world think that each must maintain the largest military and naval establishments that these establishments are the size that they are to-day?

Mr. HULL. I think that is true.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Would it not be quite as well if all the nations of the world were to cut down their naval establishments one-half?

Mr. HULL. Cut them off entirely. What is the use of having any?

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. Coming back to the——

Mr. HULL. Abandon the Army and keep a police force to preserve peace among the people, and have a great national arbitration scheme. My friend from Missouri is working out a scheme of that kind, and I hope he will succeed, but I do not believe he will during my lifetime. Just one moment further. The gentleman and I fully agree as to the fact that war is an evil that results in the destruction of property and life, and creates untold misery, although the world is often pushed ahead to higher things through its horrors. But the world is, I hope, coming to the point where it shall settle its disputes without war. It has come to the point where the taxpayers should be relieved from the awful burden, the suffering, and the deaths occuring in war. [Applause.] That, following the doctrine of the Prince of Peace, should no longer carry the gospel with the sword into any land. That is all coming about, but, my friends, we have not reached that point practically, and until we do reach it we must deal with conditions as they exist.

Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. In regard to the gentleman's statement that preparation for war is the best means of averting war, I would like to say it always seemed to me that in those sections of this country where men carried large revolvers at their belts there was much more shooting done than there was where men were not armed. It always seemed to me that the prize fighter was more ready to fight than the man not trained to fight; that the man who carries the revolver in his belt was more ready to shoot than the man who was never accustomed to carry arms. I will be glad to furnish the gentleman with statistics from any of the States in the northern and eastern section where that is very limited, and the gentleman well knows that there are statistics of the early days, when in the States and Territories of the West almost every man carried a weapon at his belt and shooting was frequent—and death also.

Mr. HULL. I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether the gentleman ever lived in the West in the days when martial law was practically created for public safety by the individual citizen, but I have. The gentleman is from Massachusetts, one of the oldest settled States in the Union, but when it was first settled every man carried his gun. He would not go out into the field to plant corn without his gun. Pennsylvania was settled by a man who felt that if a fellow struck you on one cheek that you should offer him the other, and the Indians were not unfriendly. Now, gentlemen, we are not all animated by that idea. Massachusetts has, however, evolved itself out of the condition when every man was prepared to protect himself, and now no man from Massachusetts will carry a gun unless he belongs to a military organization or the police force. We did not get to that condition in the West as soon as Massachusetts because we did not start as soon. I was in Montana just after the civil war. I went there for my health, and there was such a general lawlessness that you could not live there at all in safety.

A great criminal class had grown up there, and one morning when I woke up and looked across the street seven splendid scoundrels were hanging from one limb of a tree. After that we could leave our doors open, you could leave your goods unguarded and not have one single thing touched. It was the love of law in the hearts of the decent people of the camp which impelled them to administer this punishment to the lawless. Every man carried a gun, but it was a precautionary measure and the use of the gun rarely necessary.

My friend the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] has probably seen something of that in the great West. But we have outgrown these conditions. A man then who did not carry a gun was in danger of not being able to take a drink when he wanted it. A man who did not carry a gun then (while he might never have to fire his gun if he did carry it) would have been regarded as a crank and drummed out of the community. But that is of the past. They have law and order there now. Now we are developing as rapidly in civilization and orderly government as any part of the nation.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. That is just the point. Are we? The thing that strikes me as peculiar is this: I agree with the gentleman's remarks that society in the United States has developed, that we have had an evolution from the barbaric period he mentioned——

Mr. HULL. Now, if the gentleman will allow me a minute,

I will try to work out my idea. Otherwise, I am afraid it will get so mixed that I shall not be able to straighten it out.

Mr. SULLIVAN of Massachusetts. But the nations of the world have not kept pace in civilization with the individuals of particular countries, because instead of disarming, as the men out West have done, the nations are increasing their armament every day. They are increasing both their standing armies and their naval establishments. In that particular the nations have failed to keep up with the march of civilization attained by the individual citizens of the leading nations of the world.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman from Massachusetts must be too great a philosopher and too profound a thinker to believe that the great nations of the world, under widely different circumstances, can keep up with the progress of the individual citizen in the freest government on earth. He must be too great and broad a thinker to believe that the peasantry of Europe, or even the lower classes of the most advanced monarchies of Europe, would keep pace with the splendid progress of the individual citizen of the United States, where the public school is taken to his door, and where he is taught from infancy up that after he reaches 21 years of age part of the responsibility of administering the affairs of this great Government will rest upon his shoulders. It develops him in mind, in character, and in civilization in a way that can not be brought to the individual in any Government where the individual is not the supreme power of the land. And when you come to the advancement of the nations, let the gentleman look back a hundred years, when wars were frequent, when petty conflicts between nations were constantly going on, and compare that time with to-day, with the peace that has lasted during the last quarter of a century, with the advanced thought that is coming into all the chancelleries of the nations, into the interchange of views, into the rapid communication.

Why, the whole world is getting akin to-day. The telegraph, the rapid transit by land and water, the constant intercommunication of all the communities of all the nations of the world, are bringing the world into closer relationship all the time; and while the advancement of other nations may be slow, because they have not the advantages that we hold for individual development, yet I believe in the Providence of God the time is coming when all the nations will recognize each other as akin and entitled to all the rights of manhood and of self-government. [Applause.] But until that time comes we have got to face the world as it is to-day, and be ready to maintain our rights in every quarter of the globe where any individual American citizen is attacked, or when any principle is involved that calls for the exercise of the sovereignty of this great nation.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. It may seem illogical for the friends of peace and arbitration to vote appropriations for armies and navies, but on their behalf I should like to state here and now, since my name has been mentioned in connection with the discussion of this subject, that as long as the civilized nations of the globe have failed to negotiate arbitration treaties for the settlement of controversies by peaceful means, the same as differences are settled between individuals by courts—as long as that has not been done, the friends of peace and arbitration find it necessary to continue to vote for the maintenance of naval and military establishments. So that there is no controversy between us. But while I am on my feet I would like to call the attention of the House, with the permission of the gentleman from Iowa——

Mr. HULL. I will yield to the gentleman what time he wants.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. I have introduced a resolution providing that the delegates to be appointed by President Roosevelt to The Hague conference be instructed in favor of two propositions. One is that arbitration treaties be concluded between the different nations signatory to the first Hague treaty, and, secondly, an international congress be provided by that conference at The Hague. If we can pass these resolutions through the House and the American delegates sent to represent us there will favor these propositions, I have no doubt but that the European cabinets will be ready to accept the American plan. And if that plan is adopted, then, gentlemen, it will be no more necessary to discuss questions of the increase of the naval power and the Army, because the reduction of these armaments will gradually do away with them, and that will follow as certain as the sun rises in the morning. [Applause.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I think I have trespassed upon the patience of the House about long enough. I will take up the rest of the bill under the five-minute rule. Before closing, however, I want to say one word. I do not want the House to believe that I have in my remarks on China criticised the higher or governing classes, because I believe they have tried and will try to preserve a peaceful condition. The governing class in China, in my judgment, has great difficulties to contend with to-day in their administration of affairs. I would not want by any chance remark of mine on the floor of the House to lead to the idea that I was criticising them.

The Chinese people are not a people familiar with law or with government as we understand it. They are not much in love with our Christianity. They resent our missionary methods. They resent many of the things that our people do there. But I believe that the awakening of that country, if it can be guided and directed aright, will ultimately result in China joining the civilized nations of the world. That will not come in my day, because the reenlightenment and work of development of an entire people situated as China is, without railroads or telegraphs or the daily papers, will take more than the short span of life allotted to a man of my age. But I believe it will come, and while that great work of development is going on, I do not want any chance remark that I may make on the floor of the House to add to the difficulties of those who must solve this problem in their own land.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota rose.

Mr. HULL. I will yield to the gentleman from Minnesota.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. The gentleman is no doubt very well posted in military and naval affairs, and I assume that his statements thus far have this tendency: That preparation for war is the most effective remedy to prevent war; that large armies, at least of civilized nations, will have a tendency to keep peace throughout the civilized world.

To a certain extent I agree with that proposition, yet it has developed at the present time that old China, which has been asleep for many thousand years, is now becoming awakened, and, as the gentleman from Wisconsin said, is about to turn over. I would like to ask the gentleman, who is a statesman of no mean ability and, on the contrary, of great ability, if he thinks that this civilized nation of the United States at the present time ought in any manner to encourage the Chinese Empire, with its hundreds of millions of population, in an armament of that horde or in presenting to the world a live, wide-awake navy for the purpose of perfecting business in the Orient?

Mr. HULL. I do not understand that we are trying to get them to arm. I think one of our troubles there, and I say it with all reverence as a believer in the Christian religion, one cause of our trouble is that our missionaries are overzealous in demanding that they burn down their joss houses and erect Christian temples. I think that is one of the great troubles. I would like to get them so civilized that they would allow the missionaries to preach any doctrine that they pleased—Buddhism, Mahometism, or Christianity—without disturbing the placid course of their national life, and because I am in favor of their advancing with civilization is no reason to argue that I am in favor of a large armament or large navy. I will say this to the gentleman, that if when they have awakened and do turn over, as suggested by the gentleman from Wisconsin, and the world stands as it does to-day, practically an armed camp, she will organize an army and she will build a navy, and let us hope that as she turns over she may reach the broader and higher ground of our civilization, which teaches that peace is best for all nations, and that she will not use her army or her navy except when it becomes necessary for the preservation of her rights, her dignity, her commerce, or her laws. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Fifty years ago the Japanese nation, as the gentleman has stated, was as far back in barbarism as the Chinese nation is to-day.

Mr. HULL. Oh, it is a little over fifty years ago—that is, from western civilization.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. They began to become civilized and at the same time they began to arm their people and build a navy, and the result of that armament showed itself in the present Russian-Japanese war and the resultant civilization, as the gentleman states and as I firmly believe. Now, if the Chinese nation is to be rejuvenated the same as the Japanese and the armament the same, what will be the result on the peace of Europe and of Asia if they have to establish their civilization and power in the same manner that the Japanese have established theirs?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman that I would not like to say that the Japanese half a century ago were not a civilized people. They were not civilized from our point of view, but they had had a civilization there for more than four thousand years that answered their purpose very well. I would not like to say to-day that the Chinese are not a civilized people, because they have had a civilization there reaching back when our ancestors were wearing skins and living principally upon raw meat. They have their civilization.

They have their religion. It is not according to our ideas or our views. Does the gentleman believe that the awakening of Japan and the war with Russia was a disadvantage to the civilization of the world? Does he believe that Japan's power to resist the encroachments of the "bear" has resulted in any injury to mankind?

Suppose that Japan had not been able to defend herself. Suppose that the great power of Russia had gone and found Japan as defenseless as China; that power of Russia would have swallowed up Formosa, Korea, and Japan, and it would have forced at the point of the sword and by Russian methods a civilization that to the American mind is just about as bad as the civilization of China and Japan ever was. The fact that she could resist the progress of this great power of the north has let mankind breathe more freely, and to my mind in place of being something to dread it is something that we should rejoice in; and if China's great might in the future should be exercised as beneficially as that of Japan, then I am willing that she should have soldiers to the number of a million, or more than that, which will enable her to do so. [Applause.]

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. I agree with the gentleman in what he says has resulted for the advancement of civilization, but does the gentleman believe in awakening old China simply for the purpose of advancing civilization, even if she, with her four or five hundred millions, is to overrun and conquer every nation in the Orient?

Mr. HULL. No; she is not going to do it. Let us have more faith in the future.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Does the gentleman believe that she is going to do it?

Mr. HULL. I am too much of an optimist to believe that there is any danger of that. I do not believe that we are going to witness any dreadful effects from awakening China.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I feel again like apologizing for having taken so much as an hour and a half, and I shall reserve the balance of my time. There are many points of the bill that I intended to speak of, but I was sidetracked off the subject, but which I will explain under the five-minute rule.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there is one question that I would like to ask the gentleman. On page 5 of the bill there is the following language:

Provided, That until June 30, 1907, the line receipts of the Alaskan military cable and telegraph system may be utilized in making such extensions to the system as may be approved by the President as a military necessity, such extensions to be reported to Congress by the Secretary of War.

Does the gentleman not think that it would be better to ascertain how much money could be judiciously used for that purpose and appropriate the money, not make an appropriation in this indefinite and unsatisfactory language?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I will agree with the gentleman on that proposition as a rule. This, however, does appropriate about $200,000 a year as the outside amount. The receipts of the Alaskan cable for the last year were about $150,000, and it was estimated the receipts would be about $200,000 for the coming year. It is a question in my mind whether we should make such appropriations, but as originally submitted to the committee and urged upon us, it was to appropriate the entire receipts for the advancement of the telegraph communication with Alaska, regardless of military necessities.

The committee believed we ought to safeguard that so that the President could only use the amount necessary to protect the different posts and build such additional lines as in his judgment would be demanded as a military necessity. I will say to the gentleman that there is a very wide feeling, not only in Congress but in the country at large, that we can hardly treat Alaska as we do the other Territories. It is isolated, of great extent, its population is far scattered, and it is impossible for them to carry on the work of public improvement that would be done in other places, and while I am not willing to enter into the building up of Alaska by governmental action, yet I thought it was but a small concession to let them have this much money.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My objection is not to the extension of the lines there, either for military or commercial purposes. My objection is to the form of the provision, and that is to take indefinite receipts and utilize them for doing this work without having them turned into the Treasury and reappropriated, and I would suggest, regardless of the amount, it is much better practice to appropriate directly the money, authorizing the entire sum, or so much as may be necessary, to be expended under the direction of the President.

Mr. HULL. That can all come up when we reach it under the five-minute rule, and I think that is a question that deserves very careful consideration.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman knows we had some questions of that kind in connection with the Panama Railroad, which is a Government institution.

Mr. HULL. This is a question which demands and should have careful consideration, and, so far as I am concerned and so far as the committee is concerned, in my judgment, we have no preconceived prejudices in the matter which would lead us to oppose a fair adjustment of this question. It is a proposition that was particularly championed by the gentleman's colleague, the senior member of the minority of the Committee on Military Affairs. The committee did restrict the amount by putting in that it must be, in the opinion of the President, for military purposes, and we did that not because we were not willing as individual members to go beyond it, but we did not believe our committee would have jurisdiction over any line of improvement that was not connected with the military establishment of the United States. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CRUMPACKER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PARKINSON, its reading clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

House concurrent resolution 20.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President of the United States be requested to return to the House of Representatives H. R. 1059, granting an increase of pension to Elijah Spangler.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 3318) to allow the entrance and clearance of vessels at San Luis Obispo, Port Harford, and Monterey, Cal.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. GEORGE A. CASTOR, late a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania.

Resolved, That a committee of four Senators be appointed by the Vice-President to join the committee appointed on the part of the House of Representatives to take order for superintending the funeral of the deceased.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

And that in compliance with the foregoing the Vice-President had appointed as said committee Mr. PENROSE, Mr. KNOX, Mr. CARTER, and Mr. CLAY.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title; in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 4016. An act for establishing a light-vessel off Nantucket Shoals, Massachusetts.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to occupy time by discussing the salient features of the bill, which have been covered by the discussion given to it by the chairman of the committee. There are, however, some provisions in the bill which I will discuss later on under the five-minute rule.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, from the beginning of the Government the question of taxation has been the most important issue with which Congress has had to deal. Parties have been divided on this question when divisions on other questions have been imperceptible or transient. To-day the Republican party stands for a protective tariff, while the Democratic party stands with equal determination for a tariff for revenue only. The policies of the Republican party have been ruling the policies of the country for practically fifty years, and have confessedly resulted in the enormous trusts which are dominating the industrial conditions of the country. Republican legislation has tended to hold back the progress of agriculture, and the farmer has been taxed to build up other industries than his own. The Dingley Act, the latest and most unjust achievement of high protection, has finally incited Germany to retaliate against the United States by the adoption of tariff schedules avowedly directed against our agricultural products.

It is admitted that we produce a surplus of agricultural products, and every intelligent farmer knows that we must have a market for this surplus. Germany for years past has been a market for a portion of this surplus. Her new tariff schedules go into effect on March 1, 1906, and as I will show later on we will virtually be deprived of this market. If Germany has retaliated we may expect other nations to follow her example, and the Dingley Act is a constant menace to the agricultural interests of the country. Unless some remedy is found, this action on the part of Germany will injure permanently the agricultural classes of the United States, and also the commercial classes.

The agitation in Germany which has resulted in the passage of the new German tariff act was based upon the idea that Germany's present commercial relations with the United States were most unsatisfactory. It is asserted that since 1890 the imports into Germany from the United States have increased $128,520,000, while the exports from Germany to the United States during the same period have increased only $18,088,000, thus proving that this international exchange trade is overwhelmingly in favor of the United States. From the standpoint of a German high protectionist, goods from the United States will stand a higher rate when imported into the German Empire; that higher rate will protect German manufactures and German labor, besides yielding a large revenue. This argument is the basis of Dingleyism, and the only wonder is that the consequence of Dingleyism has not come sooner. Dingleyism exploits a favorable balance of trade and claims credit for it. Why should not the protectionists of Germany seek a more favorable balance through Dingley methods?

Our export trade is our greatest source of prosperity. We have been exporting:

Total exports, domestic merchandise:
1903	$1,392,231,302
1904	1,435,179,017
1905	1,491,744,695
Our imports were:
1903	1,025,719,237
1904	991,087,371
1905	1,117,512,629

(See Monthly Summary of Commerce and Finance, June, 1905.)

Germany began the agitation of this question as early as 1902. A German tariff commission was appointed, which sat for many months and made a most voluminous report. These findings became the basis of a new tariff act, passed in December, 1903, by the German Reichstag. This law goes into effect as against all the world except such nations as have treaty agreements with the Empire, on March 1, 1906.

We have had warning that this war would come, not only by the passage of the act itself, but by the discussion which it has engendered in all economic circles of the world. And our own consuls to the German Empire, some of whom seem to think themselves authority upon the vexed question, have gathered a vast amount of "patriotic" matter, showing that the United States need not be afraid. These consular reports abound in one-sided statements and serve to inflame and keep alive the sectional jealousy of the two nations.

Notwithstanding this notice, things have been permitted to drift along until at the present moment the threatened tariff war is at hand, without any preparation whatever having been made upon our part to meet it.

That the Dingley tariff was the occasion in large part for the new German tariff is undoubtedly true. Upon the passage of the Dingley Act twelve countries—the United Kingdom, Germany, Netherlands, Belgium, Italy, Japan, Denmark, China, Argentina, Austria-Hungary, Greece, and Switzerland—protested. This was in 1897. Little regard was attached to the protest, and because nothing was done at once it was thought that nothing ever would be done. The Republican campaign text-book of 1904 calls attention to the protest, and, because of the fact that nothing was done at once, made sport of the idea of retaliation.

The reason that a policy of retaliation was not taken at once may be found in the fact that Germany in 1897 was under treaty obligations with several European countries and would not move in the direction of increase until the expiration of the time limit of those treaties, viz, between 1903 and 1905.

Germany was at that time operating under what is called "the general and conventional tariff system." A general system of tariff alone has but one rate of duties for all countries. The system of Germany, on the contrary, has two rates, the general and the conventional, the conventional being brought about by a series of conventions or agreements with other countries. One of these conventions was made with the United States in 1900.

The system of France differs from the general and conventional tariff system in form and origin. It has two rates, the maximum and minimum, the minimum schedule being given to those nations alone which receive the most-favored-nation treatment. In origin it differs more materially in that it is entirely legislative. The legislature fixes two rates of duty on each article in the tariff. The higher rate attaches to all goods coming from countries with which there is no commercial agreement; the lower rate attaches to all goods coming from such favored countries. The multiple or maximum or minimum tariff systems are in vogue in France, Spain, Russia, Brazil, Greece, and Norway, and the new tariff of Germany is but a change from the general and conventional system to the multiple system. Before the new system could become effective Germany had to give notice to all those countries with which she had negotiated conventions under the old system. And as our arrangement with Germany in 1900 was founded expressly upon the tariff duties of Germany's old commercial treaties, it of course ended with the abrogation of these treaties.

The new German tariff becomes operative against all the world on March 1, 1906.

Chancellor Von Buelow's public expression of the case is as follows:

A continuation of the present conditions unchanged is not possible, if only for the formal reason that our arrangement of 1900 with the United States is founded expressly upon the tariff duties under the old commercial treaties with Austria-Hungary, Italy, Switzerland, Belgium, Servia, Roumania, and Russia. These duties, in consequence of our new tariff and our new commercial treaties, will be abolished at the end of February, 1906. Thus the German-American agreement will lose its basis when the new tariff goes into effect March 1 next, and therefore the Imperial Government is under the necessity of giving notice of the termination of this agreement on March 1.

We by no means wish, however, that the present agreement should not be superseded by another arrangement. We have naturally a lively interest to reach a new agreement with the United States, and this wish corresponds not only with the friendly political relations of the two people, but also with the economic needs of both. Of course, we wish in our new agreement with the United States to maintain the same points of view as those that controlled us in recasting our general commercial relationships and in the new commercial treaties already negotiated.

The Official German Report on the Tariff for 1902 states that in the future any measures for the protection of the export industries shall not lead to any reduction of the tariff duties which are regarded as necessary for the protection of agriculture.

The new tariff bill of Germany is in high favor with the agricultural classes and is opposed to some extent by the other classes. Consul-General Guenther, in July, 1905, said:

In an overwhelming majority, the shipping line, manufacturing and exporting interests, and the working population of Germany are averse to the new commercial treaties and look with prospective dread on the new tariff law.

The German law seems to favor the agricultural classes of Germany and to conserve their interests while attempting to fashion a tariff law. The new law will hurt the manufacturers of Germany, but will help its farmers; it will not hurt the manufacturers of the United States materially, but it will hurt the agricultural classes of the United States. But who cares for the farmers of the United States? The manufacturing interests dominate the legislation of the United States, and so long as the manufacturing interest is not hurt materially, are willing to stand pat on the Dingley tariff bill, or even to raise its rates 25 per cent to meet the German law, even though every farmer should be driven into bankruptcy.

The new German tariff law discriminates against nearly every article of import between the United States except cotton, oil, copper, and a few other raw products that are needed by German manufacturers and which, under the new law, will be admitted practically free.

THE NEW RATES.

The following synopsis, under three heads, gives, first, the present rate of duty; second, the minimum rate to which these duties have been hitherto reduced by treaties with certain favored nations, including the United States; third, the rate under the new law, per 220.4 pounds:

Description.	Present maximum.	Treaty duties.	New rates.
Wheat	$1.19	$0.83	$1.78
Rye	1.19	.83	1.66
Oats	.95	.67	1.66
Barley	.53	.47	1.66
Barley malt	.95	.85	2.44
Corn	.47	.38	1.19
Wheat flour	2.50	1.74	4.36
Potatoes	Free.	Free.	.50
Oatmeal	2.50	1.74	4.36
Hops	4.76	3.38	16.66
Dried apples, pears, etc.	.95	.95	2.38
Fresh apples in barrels	Free.	Free.	16.66
Sausages	4.76	4.04	2.97
Lard	2.38	2.38	10.71
Cured meats	4.76	4.04	7.14
Butter	4.76	3.80	7.14
Cheese	4.76	4.76	1.42
Eggs	.71	.47	7.14
Oleomargarine	4.76	3.80

Description.	Present maximum.	Treaty duties.	New rates.
Cows and oxen, per head	$2.14	$2.14	$4.28
Horses, per head	4.76	4.76	21.42 / 85.68
Hogs, per head	1.42	1.19	4.28
Oysters, shell	11.90		23.80
Wood alcohol	Free.	Free.	4.76
Shoes:
Coarse	11.90	11.90	20.23
Medium	16.66	15.47	28.86
Fine	16.66	15.47	42.84
Lumber:
Rough			1.42
Dressed	2.38	2.38	2.38
Sewing machines:
Treadle	5.71	5.71	8.33
Power	5.71	5.71	4.76
Bicycles		9.52	35.70

Raw cotton, flax fiber, and most other raw materials, including copper, lead, and aluminum, remain free of duty.

Spades, shovels, hoes, and plowshares, hay and manure forks, scythes, sickles, and straw cutters were reduced from $2.38 per 220.4 pounds to $1.07 for spades, shovels, and plowshares, $1.78 for hay and manure forks, and $2.85 for scythes, sickles, and straw cutters.

The whole bill was a triumph for the farmers; but this reduction upon these articles, coming as it did after one of the fiercest fights ever made in the German Reichstag, illustrates the power which the agricultural classes maintain against the industrial and mercantile classes.

Wheat under our present treaty goes into Germany at 83 cents, but on March 1, 1906, will pay $1.78 per 220.4 pounds, unless a new arrangement shall be made. No arrangement can be made, however, under the law, which reduces wheat below $1.30 per 220.4 pounds. The minimum rate on rye is $1.19; on barley malt, 95 cents; on oats, $1.19. The rate on flour, $4.06 per barrel of 196 pounds, is practically prohibitive. The milling interest of Germany includes a vast number of small mills, located in every part of the Empire, and owned by so large a number of persons that their interests are certain to be permanently and securely protected, even though a conventional treaty should be negotiated. American flour is practically dead in Germany. The millers will buy American wheat, even under these rates, and undersell American manufacturers of flour at every bend of the road.

This tariff will also affect the fruit interests of the United States. Fresh apples, pears, and quinces have been admitted free heretofore, and a large export to Germany has been built up since 1898. During eleven months of the year 1902, 110,327 tons of fresh apples went into Germany, of which the United States contributed 1,071 tons. Under the new tariff unpacked apples, pears, and quinces shall go in free from September 25 to November 25 of each year. During the other ten months all packed apples must pay $2.38 per 220.4 pounds. This is a very ingenious device. It enables the farmers of Germany and of the countries contiguous thereto to sell their fruit during the apple harvest at a nominal tariff, while the fruit going over sea or long distances by rail will be assessed at about $2 per barrel. The question of future German trade in fresh fruit will depend, therefore, on whether it can be shipped in sacks or loose over sea or long distances by rail. The Germans like American apples, but it is very doubtful whether the fruit can stand this duty.

This is the first tariff law passed with the avowed purpose of enhancing the interests of agriculture. Every other tariff law had been dominated by the protective idea to manufactures.

A comparison of the preceding German rates shows that they are higher than were the Dingley rates upon wheat, rye, oats, barley, and corn. The Dingley rate on wheat is about 92 cents per 220.4; on rye, 56 cents; on oats, $1.05; on barley, $1.38; on corn, 60 cents. The Dingley rate on wheat flour is, ad valorem, 25 per cent. The Dingley rate on green apples in barrels is about 68 cents per barrel. The Dingley rate on horses is from $25 to $30 a head; hogs, $1.50 per head; cattle, $2 to $4 per head, and if valued at more than $14, 27½ per cent. The Dingley rate on lard is higher than the new German rate, being $4.40 per 220.4 pounds. The Dingley rate on meats is also higher than the German tariff. The Dingley rate on butter is still nearly twice as high as the German rate, as is cheese. The Dingley tariff on eggs is 5 cents a dozen, which I think is still higher than the German tariff. But our agricultural products do not need these rates, for we export all of these articles, and practically none of them are imported.

VALUE OF OUR EXPORTS AS TO KINDS.

The total value of our exports to all countries for the year ending June 30, 1905, as to the class from which they originate, is as follows:

Description.	Value.	Per cent.
Products of agriculture	$821,074,439	55.4
Products of manufactures	543,620,297	36.44
Products of mining	50,646,447	3.39
Products of forests	62,008,899	4.16

The Republican Campaign Text-Book for 1904 states that the object of a protective tariff is to conserve and develop the home market for the home producer. This looks like an intention to save that market, not alone for the manufacturer, but for the agriculturalist. An analysis of the tariff, however, shows that the higher or prohibitive rates are upon manufactured articles. To conserve the home market means that the home trade shall have that market, and the higher rates, called "protective rates," do save that market, not to the agriculturalist, for he must seek his market outside of the home market for all those products which go to make up the great bulk of our export trade. It conserves the home market to the manufacturing class alone by a tariff which excludes foreign competition. In other words, higher prices are thereby guaranteed to the manufacturing interests than would obtain were competition more general.

Why should agriculture, which sustains itself in the home market and sells to the world more than half our export trade, bear a greater burden than the manufacturing interest, which sells to the market at inflated prices, and one-third of our export value at prices less than are charged at home?

EXPORTS TO GERMANY.

For the year ending June 30, 1905, we exported the following valuation of goods to Germany (see Monthly Summary of Commerce and Finance of the United States, July, 1905):

Description.	Value, 1904.	Value, 1905.

[d] Very little sold in all Europe.
[e] Practically no export.

OUR TRADE BALANCES.

For thirteen years prior to 1905 the excess of Germany's imports from the United States were as follows:

1892	$22,000,000
1894	22,000,000
1895	11,039,000
1896	3,656,000
1897	14,000,000
1898	85,000,000
1899	71,000,000
1900	89,000,000
1901	91,000,000
1902	71,000,000
1903	74,000,000
1904	105,000,000

From 1883 to 1892 the balance was on the other side, as it was in 1893. (See Statistical Abstract, 1904.)

The Dingley tariff was prohibitive. Germany could not on account of the tariff sell us her manufactured goods, practically all she had to sell, and the balance went still more heavily against her. She bought our agricultural products freely, even putting raw cotton on a practically free list, but we taxed her out of our markets.

From 1882 to 1892 the balance of trade was with Germany, we during those years buying more of her than she of us, but the highest balance was never more than $22,000,000. (See Statistical Abstract, 1904, p. 584.)

The tariff of France, being higher than the old German tariff, works more evenly, and makes a more evenly divided balance. In 1904 we bought of France $81,000,000, and she bought of us about $84,000,000. The average run of yearly balances is about equally divided between us and France. One year it is on one side, and vice versa.

We have been buying more of Austria than we have sold her for several years.

Italy has been discriminated against by Dingleyism, and the balance is on our side.

We sell England about three times as much as we buy from her year after year, and she remains our best customer. It is a remarkable commentary on the doctrine of free trade that the only nation which practices it is not only our best customer, but the one which does more for our agriculturists than does our home Government. Our Constitution forbids export duties. Were this not so the high protectionists of the United States would doubtlessly stop free cotton to Germany and free farm products to the United Kingdom. The countries of Europe exist to support the farmers of the United States. The Government of the United States exists to support home manufacturers.

Said Mulhall in 1904:

> The United States produce about one-third of the manufactured totals of nations, as they do also of grain and wheat, while their population is less than one-sixth. * * * American manufacturers have multiplied just twentyfold since 1840, while those of Europe have only doubled. Nearly all American manufactures are produced by machinery, while in Europe less than one-half is hand work. * * * The value of American manufacturers is artificially raised by protective tariffs fully 33 per cent over the real value; the latter amounts, therefore, in 1894, to about £,464 millions sterling, or the value conjointly of British and French manufactures.

There were 29,000,000 persons in the United States in 1900 employed for gain, of which the manufacturing class formed about 7,000,000. Why should 22,000,000 workers pay a toll of 33 per cent in higher prices to conserve the interests of 7,000,000 that confessedly need more protection? How are we to know that they do not need it?

1. The manufacturers themselves, in their divided sentiment, make this admission: Some demand no change; some ask a revision of the tariff, and they represent no insignificant class; some, a lesser number, are willing to eliminate the tariff upon leather for free hides, etc.

2. Leading protection papers say that the tariff is too high.

3. The academic and economic thought of the country is almost a unit against the Dingley schedules.

4. The President favors a revision.

5. The unequal distribution of wealth since 1850 proves that protection, as a principle, transfers an unwarranted part of the gains of 22,000,000 of workers into the pockets of 7,000,000.

We want manufactures, and no power on earth can destroy them. But we do not want a system of predatory manufactures taking to itself an unwarranted part of the gains of the country.

City wealth, almost synonymous with manufacturing wealth, started in 1850 with about the same figures as rural or agricultural wealth. Rural wealth doubled from 1850 to 1860, but did not double again until 1890, a period of thirty years. City wealth doubled in every decade from 1860 to 1880 and almost doubled in each decade since. City wealth in 1900 was $73,786,000,000, while rural wealth was but $20,514,000,000.

Agriculture kept pace with manufactures in the low-tariff period 1850–1860, but has never done so since.

It would seem that the farmers of the United States, in their own interests, ought to be against the system of high protection. The time is ripe for a change, a change which will give to the farmer a market for his produce and insure better and permanent prices for the products of his farm.

Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty-five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD].

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Chairman, the continued failure of the Republican party to modify the oppressive schedules of the Dingley tariff demonstrates its utter incapacity for further control of the American Government. Almost nine years have passed since the Republican party imposed upon the American people the highest tariff taxes in American history. For almost nine years the American people have borne these tariff outrages without rising in righteous anger against the Republican party. The American people have shown the Republican party such leniency, such indulgence, such submission that it seems to have lost all sense of responsibility. Although Republican leaders know that the revision of the tariff is the most clamorous necessity of the time, they treat the question with a silence so persistent and so insolent that it can result from no other source than a sense of power as complete as it is merciless, as absolute as it is corrupt. [Applause on the Democratic side.] So universal has become the clamor, so pressing the need, so just the cry for relief from excessive tariff taxes that the inactivity of the Republican party may be explained only on the ground that it considers the people's support an asset so permanent as to be the easy subject of perpetual disregard. Whenever any political party reaches this stage of swollen egotism and contemptuous defiance it becomes a distinct peril to American institutions. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The course of the Republican party on the subject of the tariff has been singularly treacherous and oppressive. The entire history of the party is a history of increasing tariff charges. It failed to reduce the enormous emergency tariffs of the civil war when the return of peace had removed the necessity for abnormal rates. It has remained under the domination of the classes its tariffs have fostered. It has evaded every demand for revision. In 1867, in 1870, in 1872, and in 1882 it pretended to undertake tariff modification, but the taxes which shielded the favored interests were never lowered. The McKinley bill of 1890 established schedules from 10 to 50 per cent higher than those of the war. In 1897 the Dingley bill—the bill now in operation—added still higher rates. The highest tariff of the war was that of 1864. It reached an approximate average of 49 per cent. The duties of the Dingley bill range from 50 to more than 200 per cent. It is amazing that the people should tolerate such exactions. In the present Congress a prominent Republican has introduced a bill increasing the Dingley rates under certain conditions.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman having referred to a distinguished Republican introducing a bill for the purpose of increasing the rates, I beg to call his attention to the fact that a Washington paper of yesterday contained an interview with the gentleman in which he said that was done for the purpose of scaring Germany, and that Germany now having been scared, he did not propose to insist upon it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Then the bill served its purpose.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I understand in reality, however, that the bill will not prevent Germany from imposing the high tariff rates. The only thing that can be accomplished in the German Reichstag is a mere postponement of the high tariff rates which were to go into effect on March 1.

Mr. BARTLETT. I trust the gentleman did not understand me to agree with the gentleman who introduced the bill. I think there are some other reasons behind the introduction of the bill, and some other reasons behind the statement contained in the press than the one which the gentleman gives.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I thank the gentleman for the enlightenment he gives on that subject.

Each Republican Administration seems to have replied to the popular prayer for tax reduction as Rehoboam, King of Israel, answered the clamors of his subjects for the remission of the taxes levied by his father, Solomon, saying:

> My little finger shall be thicker than my father's loins. And now, whereas my father did lade you with a heavy yoke, I will add to your yoke; my father hath chastised you with whips, but I will chastise you with scorpions.

[Applause on the Democratic side.]

While studying the subject of scriptural taxation I noted the fact that the men who grew rich through the gathering of taxes in Jerusalem were called "publicans." And I thought of that party of men in the United States who create vast fortunes through tariff taxes. And as they seemed to me a reappearance of that ancient class who consumed the people's substance in Judea, it struck me as particularly appropriate that these modern tax mongers and tariff fashioners should be called "Re-publicans." [Laughter.]

Mr. STANLEY. Are not those gentlemen usually referred to as publicans and sinners? I never saw the word used by itself. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHEPPARD. The present Republican party is worthy of both designations. [Laughter.]

The Dingley tariff is a constant challenge to the world. It is a menace to the peace of man, a perpetual provocation of commercial war. It is a fruitful source of international contention. Already retaliatory tariffs are frowning from foreign boundaries. We can not forever close our markets to the peoples who consume the surplus products of our factories and farms. We can not interpose the closed door in the face of the world and command it to hold out to us the open door. Harmonious trade relations form the most permanent basis of national and international progress. Wars of commerce lead to wars of arms. How grotesque is the spectacle presented by the President of the United States, who towered into a veritable archangel of peace in beginning the movement for a second conference at The Hague and in summoning Russia and Japan to Portsmouth, and yet who, through his silence on the Dingley law, gives advocacy to a policy which invites universal hostility and universal war. [Applause.] If Portsmouth and The Hague have fashioned him into a peacemaker, Dingleyism has made him a peace destroyer. Indeed the very war which he helped to settle, the war between Russia and Japan, found one of its leading causes in the imposition of a high protective tariff, a Russian Dingley law, along the Manchurian frontier.

If the President would follow with sincerity the rôle he has assumed, let him contribute his energies to the abolition of a commercial system which strikes at the vital sources of the world's tranquility. The Dingley system produces oppression and inequality at home; it arouses hostility abroad. Almost every important country is contemplating or inaugurating retaliation. Germany has prepared a new tariff, which singles out the United States as the especial object of commercial enmity; a tariff which levies a duty of 58½ per cent on wheat; a tariff which increases the duty on rye 100 per cent, on oats over 148 per cent, on corn over 200 per cent, on mules 200 per cent, on cattle and beef over 150 per cent, on flour over 150 per cent, on shoes over 80 per cent, and on practically all our exportations to Germany from 50 to 100 per cent. These rates were to become effective on March 1; it is possible that the time may be extended. Nothing, however, can prevent their final and permanent imposition except a reduction of the Dingley charges. And yet we have had in Germany a market for one hundred and thirty-two millions of agricultural products and thirty millions of manufactured articles. Brazil has adopted a new tariff which increases duties on flour, wheat, harvesting machinery, and many other articles almost to the prohibitive point. France, Venezuela, British South Africa, and other countries have adopted similar measures.

Canada is slowly but inevitably building obstacles to our trade which ere long, as history counts time, we shall be unable to surmount. Canada is destined to become one of the richest and most populous regions of the world. It is an unspeakable shame that this marvelous country, a country made one with us by nature, the most promising market of our products on the globe, should be gradually estranged in commerce and in affection by the truculence of the Republican party to the beneficiaries of a barbarous customs tax. [Applause.] The estrangement is unavoidable unless Dingleyism is overthrown. The world is rising in commercial arms against us.

Foreign markets are the breath and blood of life to the producing masses of the United States. We have reached the period of internal development in which our sternest and most fundamental need is a widening foreign market.

The demand of the time is not for the erection of barriers against foreign trade. If foreign markets are to remain open to American products, American markets must remain open to foreign products. Trade is an exchange of commodities. Ability to sell depends upon an equal ability to buy. Burdens on the buyer affect his ability to buy, and necessarily react upon the seller. High tariff rates on foreign goods diminish the ability of foreign customers to purchase American goods, and thus imperil our foreign trade. If the commercial paramountcy of the United States is to be preserved, foreign markets must be encouraged, not destroyed. Close these markets and unparalleled distress will follow. The loss of foreign markets means the cessation of progress, the ruin of agriculture and all kindred occupations, the depopulation of cities, universal desolation, the precipitation of conditions which the language of despair would be insufficient to describe. How prophetic in the light of subsequent events is the speech of William McKinley on that September day in Buffalo, the speech which he delivered from the portal of the tomb, the speech in which he seemed to penetrate the future and to summarize the past—so wise, so liberal, so true that he seemed to possess the prescience of the God in whose presence he was about to stand.

The period of exclusiveness is past—

He said—

The expansion of our trade and commerce is the present problem. Commercial wars are unprofitable. A policy of good will and friendly trade relations prevents reprisals. Reciprocity is in harmony with the spirit of the times. Measures of retaliation are not. If perchance some of our tariffs are no longer needed for revenue or to encourage and protect our industries at home, why should not they be employed to extend and promote our markets abroad?

Such were the words of one of America's purest statesmen, showing either that he was about to surrender the doctrine of extreme protection or his conviction that there was no longer sufficient occasion for its application. He was too great to hate. He rose above the noisy prejudices of his time. He illustrated the holiness of sympathy, the sublimity of tolerance. Although many of us differed from him fundamentally on many questions, let us pause to mourn and praise him. The memory of his gentle dignity, his exalted character, in which the elements of nobility shown brightest against the gathering shadows of eternity, will receive the laurels and the tears of coming ages. [Applause.]

His death had a patriotic significance. For while the blood the soldiers of the North and South poured out in common in defense of Cuban liberty did much to erase the enmities of the past the American people were more lastingly united by the tears they shed together at William McKinley's grave. [Applause.] More than four years have passed since McKinley died, and his last message to the American people, his warning against the continuance of high tariff taxes, seems to have been buried with him. It has found no response in Republican legislation. The hosts of greed now dominant in the councils of the Republican party revere neither the living nor the dead, neither God nor the sepulcher. [Applause on Democratic side.]

The Dingley tariff bill itself contains an admission of the excessiveness of its schedules, a distinct acknowledgment that they are at least 20 per cent too high. In section 4 of the bill provision was made for a 20 per cent reduction of its rates by such reciprocity treaties as might be effected with foreign countries within two years from its passage.

Let it be remembered that the reciprocity of section 4 of the Dingley bill is entirely different from the unsatisfactory and illusive reciprocity of the Republican tariff of 1890, the latter being a false and meaningless reciprocity, confined principally to the noncompeting products of tropical countries—a reciprocity shrewdly designed to allay the objections of the farmers to high customs through the pretense of cultivating wider and more generous markets for agricultural commodities, a system of commercial blackmail which, while making apparent concessions to the rising sentiment against exorbitant protection and the general fear of a consequent loss of foreign markets, provided no substantial relief from excessive taxation and offered no permanent basis of effective negotiation. This counterfeit reciprocity had a pitiful revival in section 3 of the Dingley law with sugar and hides restored to the sheltered schedules and with argols, crude tartar, wine lees, brandies, sparkling wines, still wines, vermuth, paintings, statuary, coffee, tea, and tonka and vanilla beans constituting the insignificant list of concessionary articles.

The distinction between the reciprocity of section 4 of the Dingley bill and the reciprocity of the tariff of 1890, which was reexpressed in modified form in section 3 of the Dingley bill, can not be too strongly emphasized. It is as instructive as it is fundamental. The reciprocity of the tariff of 1890 and of section 3 of the Dingley law applies almost exclusively to articles not produced in the United States. It is the noncompetitive and ineffective reciprocity of partisan Republicanism, the reciprocity of deception at home and retaliation abroad, the empty semblance of tariff reduction and trade extension worn by high protection to disarm objection among its votaries and rebellion among its victims. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The reciprocity of section 4 applies the 20 per cent clause to every dutiable article regardless of the country of its production. To countries and to articles it is universally applicable. It makes possible a substantial exchange of commercial concessions with every country in the world. The result of its general operation would be a remarkable approach to an effective revision of the tariff. Its embodiment in section 4 is an admission of the insufficiency of the pretended reciprocity of section 3 and of the act of 1890.

Although the bare letter of McKinley's speech at Buffalo may be said to have referred more especially to the doctrine of section 3 and of the act of 1890, still the spirit of that great utterance and indeed its inevitable corollary is the reciprocity of section 4. This contention is strengthened by the fact that although McKinley was the author of the act of 1890, there was no reference to reciprocity in the bill as introduced by him in the House of Representatives, and by the further fact that he had seen the failure of the treaties negotiated under the reciprocity clause inserted in the act of 1890 under pressure from Mr. Blaine after the bill had reached the Senate.

But there is another and more significant distinction. Under the reciprocity of 1890 and of section 3 of the Dingley Act the President was empowered by treaty to modify, to suspend, or to impose certain specified rates on the articles enumerated whenever the countries producing these articles should make such trade arrangements with the United States as he might deem equitable, and the proclamation of the President was sufficient to put the treaty into operation.

Under section 4 of the Dingley law the treaties negotiated by the President can not become effective until ratified by the Senate. The former measures were simply threats of retaliation involving the exercise of mere ministerial powers by the Executive with reference to noncompeting articles and afforded no substantial relief. The latter measure, on account of its unmodified application, involved a reduction of the tariff on competing as well as noncompeting articles, a reduction which embodied substantial benefits for the American masses both as to lighter taxes and wider markets. A few treaties under section 3 were put into operation, but so powerful were the tariff-fed classes in the United States that the treaties negotiated under section 4 by a commissioner especially appointed for that purpose, Mr. Kasson, were allowed to rot in the Senate. The political history of the United States contains no gloomier illustration of the hopelessness of tariff relief through Republican agencies than the failure of the Republican Senate to ratify the reciprocity treaties negotiated under section 4 of the Dingley law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Perhaps the most interesting commentary on the Dingley tariff law and the failure of the Republican party to modify its schedules may be found in the speech of Mr. DOLLIVER, a Republican Senator from Iowa, in the United States Senate in January of 1903. Mr. DOLLIVER had served with marked distinction in the House of Representatives, having been a member of the Ways and Means Committee when it framed the Dingley bill. He was in position to speak with authority.

It is true—

He said—

that in the bill which Governor Dingley reported from the Committee on Ways and Means, of which I had the honor at the time to be a very humble member, duties were put up for the express purpose of being traded down.

This is Republican testimony of the highest character. When the American people understand that they have been victimized for nine years by a system of tariff taxes, which the Republican party deliberately made too high, and which it has never attempted in any effective way to decrease, which it has promised before every succeeding election to correct and after elections has left untouched, they will avenge their betrayal at the polls.

Mr. DOLLIVER further said that section 4 of the Dingley bill was as distinctly a part of the tariff policy of the United States as the coal schedule or any other schedule, and that more violence had been done the protective system of the United States by the quiet and uncommunicative failure of the United States Senate to take action upon the treaties negotiated under this section than by all the protests of the Democracy. He referred to McKinley's speech at Buffalo, and dramatically stated that the time had come when somebody whose convictions did not lie along the path of silence and quietude and ease in our political Zion should declare that the whole future of the protective system in the United States depended upon the wisdom with which the Congress of the United States fulfilled the aspirations which found expression so lofty in the last public utterance of William McKinley. This speech was delivered on the 13th of January, 1903. More than three years have passed since then, and nothing has been done to modify the outrages of the Dingley law.

And there was the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BABCOCK], the celebrated chairman of the Republican Congressional campaign committee, who some few years ago by the rivers of Wisconsin sat down and wept over the tyrannous schedules which enabled the trusts to sell their products in foreign lands cheaper than at home. [Laughter.] And let us not forget the President of the United States, who in his sincerer days, before the politician had supplanted the scholar, declared protection vicious in theory and harmful in practice, who recommended in his first annual message, his message of 1902, that a commission of business experts be appointed to correct the inequalities of the Dingley tariff. But in his message of 1903, his message of 1904, and his message of 1905 there was absolute silence on the subject. The ineffectual character of the bill for the regulation of railroad rates, which may become a law at this session, shows that he will accomplish little for rate reform, although he has succeeded in absolutely obstructing tariff reform. [Applause.]

And yet this is the man who in that tragic hour at Buffalo as there descended upon him the mantle stained with McKinley's blood solemnly assured the American people that he would carry out the policies of McKinley, chief among which was the abolition of despotic and unnecessary tariff taxes. Never in all the reach and sweep of time was there in a free Republic an instance of such enormous audacity, such official perfidy, as is illustrated in the Republican "stand-pat" attitude on the Dingley tariff. The situation indicates either the supreme incompetency of the Republican party or its unqualified contempt for both the intelligence and the welfare of the American people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

With an arrogance that has become habitual, Republicans attribute to high protection the chief credit for the vast material development of the last four decades. It is true that the economic growth of the United States, with its ambitious and progressive citizenship, its limitless area, its varied and exhaustless resource, its unrivaled configuration and environment, has exceeded human hope and computation. It is true that with a population of 83,000,000, less than 6 per cent of the earth's population, we produce and consume more than one-third of all the staple commodities that supply the world's comforts, necessities, and luxuries, and that this assures the commercial suzerainty of the globe and makes us the leading agricultural and industrial power of the time; but it is also true that the wealth of this modern Eden has been diverted by vicious legislation into the hands of the few, and that of the thousands of millions annually consumed in commodities by the American people a stupendous proportion is taken through the indirect taxation of an indefensible tariff to swell the countless revenues of the pampered element. If this insatiate absorption of the people's means continues, the popular cry will not be for "a square deal," but for "a square meal." [Laughter and applause.]

It is shown by the census of 1900 that of the 16,000,000 families in the United States less than 5,000,000 own their homes entirely free from incumbrance, and that over 10,000,000 American families either do not own their homes or have them mortgaged for debt. These figures are an eloquent portrayal of the concentration of wealth under Republican legislation. In the face of such conditions it is idle to talk of averages and per capitas. One man may possess a million dollars and nineteen others $100 each, and yet the average per capita wealth of the twenty would be over $50,000. Such is the situation in this Republic, where a few thousand millionaires own the overwhelming bulk of the nation's wealth, while the masses must be contented with being told that their average per capita wealth is the largest in the history of the country. Republican prosperity means superabundance for the few and privation for the many. It is not a matter of surprise that the fundamental injustice of the Dingley law has led to unparalleled corruption in almost every phase of American life—a corruption that has sullied this once immaculate temple of the people's liberties and beaten a pathway from the high places in politics, in business, and in society to the penitentiary and the grave. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Too many violated promises and broken oaths surround the record of the Republican party to justify the people in again placing it in control. It has never made a sincere and effective revision of the tariff. The Democratic party is the only party in American history that has shown the capacity and the courage to reduce offending schedules. Democrats believe that the power of taxation is the most dangerous and far-reaching power with which governments are invested. They believe that the use of this power to concentrate the earnings of the masses in the possession of favored interests, or to defray government expenditure of unnecessary and extravagant character, is tyranny in its most subtle and infamous form. The Democratic party will remove the abuses of the tariff with conservatism and intelligence. The Wilson tariff bill of 1894 was the first effective revision of the tariff since 1857. The Democratic party was given the task of modifying the destructive tariff taxes of 1828; it skillfully supplied the needed reform. It was summoned by the American people to reform the despotic tariff of 1843. It met the emergency with conspicuous success, enacting the tariff of 1846, which remained in force longer than any other tariff law in American annals, which solved the fiscal questions of the country so fairly and so justly that the tariff ceased to be an issue, and under which the American people enjoyed a more genuine prosperity, a more equitable distribution of wealth, than at any former or subsequent period of American history.

The Democracy will overthrow the absolute monarchy of the dollar which Republican policies have established. It will modify the pitiless tariff taxes which enable the petted few to strip and to despoil the people, which invoke retaliation abroad and imperil foreign markets. It will restore the tariff to the just and reasonable level determined by a careful, sane, and economic management of Government expenditure. The Democratic party is the only party in American history that has lived from the first national election to the thirtieth. It is as eternal as the principles of liberty and equality which its doctrines embody and its disciples worship. It will again be summoned by the American people to reconstruct the original Republic upon the foundations of the original Constitution. We shall then rebuild truth's broken altars, the shattered fanes of justice, and "our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Washington!" [Loud and prolonged applause on Democratic side.]

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, the consideration of the pending measure serves to remind us that we are annually expending hundreds of millions of dollars in strengthening our coast and fortification defenses, equipping and maintaining a large army, enlarging and maintaining a magnificent and powerful navy, all with the sole end in view of defending ourselves against the invasion of foreign enemies, although there is not a whispered suspicion or fear of any danger from this source; but as a justification for these enormous expenditures we are assured that the surest guaranty of peace is complete preparation for war. And this theory our people accept as true, and cheerfully pay the bills.

While we have thus taken steps to guard our country against an open enemy from without whose coming and purpose would be heralded by the marshaling of armies, beating drums, and waving banners, we must not deceive ourselves to the belief that these are our only dangers which threaten our peace and safety. There is going on every day an apparently peaceful invasion of our country by thousands of people from foreign lands who come under the guise of friendship, which enables them to plot against our Government, to inoculate our people with the noxious diseases they have, and to destroy the standard of living and wages of the American laboring man and drag them down to the level of pauper labor of the Old World.

Mr. Chairman, this should remind us that one of the most important questions demanding the attention of the Federal Congress is that of foreign immigration. And whom can we admit into the circle of our national family without injury to our domestic, moral, social, healthful, and commercial well-being? Our Government was nearly a hundred years old before Congress thought it necessary to close our doors against anyone or place any barriers in the way of free and unobstructed entry into our ports. This was in 1875, when a law was passed excluding prostitutes and persons convicted of felony and serving out their sentences for other than political crimes.

Prior to that time almost the entire immigration to this country came from northern Europe, of the same stock as our ancestors, of a brave, hardy, and industrious type of men and women, who were willing to brave the dangers of a new country where they could build homes for themselves and children and enjoy the full measure of freedom and independence guaranteed by our Constitution. We needed no laws to exclude them then. We need none now. We still have an abundance of room for healthy, industrious, law-abiding, and patriotic citizens, who, inspired by an admiration for our institutions, voluntarily come to make this their permanent home. It has been with the aid of this kind of immigration that we have developed the wonderful resources of the country until to-day, although one of the youngest among recognized nations of the earth, we are the greatest of them all. [Applause.]

It was not until after the civil war that we began to feel the evil effects of an undesirable foreign immigration, and this was promoted largely through the operation of the contract labor law, which brought to our shores thousands of the most abject and poverty-stricken of Europe, whose future there was so dark that they were willing to sell themselves into slavery for a time in order to get their way paid to this country, where they might perchance improve their condition. There are instances where these white slave dealers even went into the jails and prisons of Europe, and, under the promise of bringing the inmates to this country, secured the release of deep-dyed felons; and into the slums of the cities where lost women dwelt, gathering them together, brought them all to become fit subjects and citizens of the United States. It was this menace to our morals and security which prompted Congress to enact the first exclusion law.

New contingencies arising from time to time have made it necessary to enact other laws enlarging the excluded list; and the crying needs of to-day demand the turning away of thousands of people who should not be allowed to come among us. Before the war the people who came to our shores were patriotic and liberty-loving home seekers and home builders, who are a treasure in any land. But since that time the tide of immigration has shifted from northern and western Europe to southern and eastern Europe and to an entirely different people, different in manners, customs, education, mental and moral training, many of them without any sense of patriotism or regard for our free institutions, though they are allowed to profit by them with the ultimate purpose in view that they intended to appropriate our advantages to their own selfish ends, and in a given time return to their mother country, taking with them there every dollar they earn except what was necessary to keep soul and body together.

In fact, the difference between the immigrants who came to the country previous to the year 1880 and those coming since that time might be thus described: That the former were of our own family—kith and kin—who bade adieu to the land of their nativity and came and cast their lot with ous, pledging their lives and fortunes with ours unto the fullest development and achievements of this then but young Republic of the West.

As to the latter, most of them come only at the dictates of a spirit of commercialism, greed, and rapacity, intending only to stay long enough to gather to themselves sufficient of our wealth to enable them to live comfortably in their frugal way, and with it to return to their native country without even thanking us for our generosity in allowing them to hoodoo us. This position I will fully sustain further on, when I will go into full detail.

The following table shows the annual immigration to the United States for the past eighty-six years, which is the first year our Government began to keep such a record:

Number of immigrants arrived in the United States each year from 1820 to 1905, both inclusive.

An analysis of this table will disclose the countries from which these people came and support what I have just said. The whole number of immigrants during these years was 22,931,983. To this number Great Britain has been the largest contributor, sending us 7,286,443 of her sons and daughters. In 1851 she sent us 272,740. From the year 1892 up to and including 1904, her annual emigration was less than 40 per cent of what it was the preceding forty years, although last year it shows a material gain over the preceding thirteen years. Her figures of 1851 were never reached by any other country until last year, when Austria-Hungary outnumbered her with 275,693. Next comes Germany, a close second, with her contribution of 5,187,092. Her largest number in any one year was 215,009, in 1854, standing second to Great Britain until last year she was outnumbered by both Austria-Hungary, with 275,693, and Italy, with 221,479.

Like her neighbor, Great Britain, after the year 1893 her annual immigration fell off so largely up to and including the year 1905 that it was not more than 30 per cent of what it had been the preceding forty years. Italy ranks third in total immigration, sending in all 2,000,252, but, unlike the United Kingdom, our advantages did not attract them sufficiently until after the year 1880. Up to that year she did not send us as many as 9,000 in any one year. In 1832 she only sent 3; in the year 1880 the number reached 12,354. From that year on there was a steady and rapid increase, until the year 1903, when it reached the astonishing figures of 230,622.

Fourth in order comes Austria-Hungary, with 1,971,431, her entire emigration to the United States. Though very late in discovering the great advantages for exploitation our country afforded, she sent her first emigrants, 13 in number, in 1861. From this small beginning it grew steadily until 1900, when it took new impetus, that year reaching 114,840; 1901, 113,390; 1902, 171,989; 1903, 206,011; 1904, 177,156, and in 1905, 275,639. This is the greatest number ever sent us from any country in one year, and before I close I expect to be able to convince you that this is an unnatural condition brought about by improper influences exercised by steamship companies, foreign governments, and violators of our contract-labor laws, which demands prompt action by Congress to stay its evil consequences.

Next in order comes Scandinavia—Denmark, Norway, and Sweden—with 1,730,722 of loyal, intelligent, and industrious home builders. Beginning with 23 immigrants in 1820, which number steadily increased until in 1882 it reached 105,326, the largest number sent in any one year. During the last twenty-three years her emigration has fluctuated from 81,921 in 1888, the largest, to 19,228 in 1902, which was the smallest number.

Sixth in order comes Russia, who, like her neighbor, Austria-Hungary, was slow to awake to the great possibilities of the new country of the West, but has since made haste to seize upon the great advantages it affords.

In 1820, 14 Russians alone sought homes among us; the years 1829, 1831, 1845, 1848, and 1850 brought but one emigrant each. In 1840 not one came, but with the year 1881 there came 10,655, and since that year it has made a steady increase until last year it reached 184,879.

Seventh comes France. Though a rich and populous country she has never furnished a large quota to our immigration list. In eighty-six years only 428,869 of her people have sought our shores. The largest number came in 1850, being 20,126. Only one other year has it exceeded 15,000.

Eighth. From the terraced and vine-clad hills of Switzerland have come 220,299 welcome guests, and we have need and room for more of them. [Applause.] Although they do not seem willing to come and mix up with the ignorant, diseased, depraved, and motley set they daily see us admitting to our household from her neighboring borders of Austria-Hungary and Italy, with whom they do not commingle at home.

Least in numbers, but not in moral worth, the Netherlands have sent us 146,168 desirable sons and daughters from her small but loyal and energetic family. China, too, like Austria-Hungary and Russia, though much farther distant, was slow to learn of the great advantages our country offered, and it was not until the bewildering stories of wealth accumulated in the rich gold fields of California had spread to her shores that they began to come asking to share our blessings. In 1853 42 of them landed in California. These were followed the next year by 13,100 more. In the following twenty-nine years the number reached 288,398, the largest number in any one year being 39,579 in 1882, the year before the passage of the Chinese-exclusion act, which was prompted by no other sentiment except that they were a threatening menace to the laboring people of the United States; that their habits, customs, and religion would not permit them to imbibe the genius of our institutions or to assimilate their blood with ours, and that they only came for temporary sojourn, intending to return to their native land with all their earnings.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Kentucky yield to the gentleman from Indiana?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he does not think it strange that this great army of immigrants come to this country in the face of the alleged conditions of robbery and plunder that exist here as set forth by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD].

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, it is a game of robbery against robbery, sir. Many of them are robbers themselves, and they have been sent, as I will be able to show you later, to rob us. But while they are at it your system of protection will rob them some if they buy anything to eat, wear, or use while here.

Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS. The gentleman contends that this vast army of immigrants that have come to this country is an army of robbers?

Mr. HOPKINS. I did not mean to say that, sir. I say that part which is unnaturally similated or come here for spoils are robbers in a sense, not the honest immigrants that come seeking a home among us, not the men who would help develop our resources and become American citizens; but it is the horde that comes here for spoils and gain, that gather from us all they can, and then return to the mother country to enjoy them. Those are the people I protest against allowing to come into this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Just when the gentleman was interrupted by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CHARLES B. LANDIS] he spoke of the immigration from Austria-Hungary. I would ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether he is not aware of the fact that a very large portion—in fact, the largest portion—of the immigration from Austria-Hungary become excellent citizens of this Republic and proved themselves thrifty and industrious, and in the large cities and in some of the smaller places of this country proved by their patriotism, their good conduct, and their work the right to be enrolled into the citizenship of this Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPKINS. Many of them likely do. I do not apply the appellation to all of them. Of course, out of the large number coming there are many good ones, who are capable of becoming good citizens, and do.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. That is not in answer to the question that I put to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. HOPKINS. The gentleman says a majority of them——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HOPKINS] pardon me for a moment. He said some of them. I asked him whether it is not a fact that most of them—in fact, the largest number of them—proved themselves to be of the kind and the character referred to in the inquiry I put to the gentleman?

Mr. HOPKINS. No, sir; I do not admit it; and I will sustain that point from the records which I find in the archives of this Government, in which it is alleged that a majority of the people who are coming here from Austria under the present system come here under contract to perform labor, and come here with the avowed intention of returning to the mother country. That, sir, is the record here, and it is this fact which the records show, and upon that I stand. [Applause.]

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield further?

Mr. HOPKINS. I would like very much to answer the gentleman's inquiry, but I see that his questions are long, and my time is limited.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I will prefer to say just now, with the gentleman's permission——

Mr. HOPKINS. Go ahead.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I want to say to the gentleman from Kentucky, as I want to say to this entire House, that in the district I have the honor to represent, as in the district that immediately joins it on the north, there are a large number of this class of American citizens, who within the last twenty-five years have come from Austria-Hungary, and are of as good a character and fine a quality as any man born on American soil. [Applause.]

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not question the gentleman as to his immediate neighborhood, nor as to these immigrants who have come in former years, but my objection is to these recent arrivals sent here by the Austrian Government.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I have reference not only to my neighborhood, but I have reference to various parts of New York City, as I have reference also to every other city in this country, from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I just want to say one word. The statement of the gentleman from New York is true, not only of his own district but of two-thirds of the Congressional districts of New York as it is in his.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman from New York allow me to add that it is also true of the Austro-Hungarian immigration in the various parts of the United States.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Yes, sir; so far as I am advised.

Mr. HOPKINS. If you gentlemen feel justified in making that kind of a statement you have perfect liberty to do so. I have not intended to speak against that class of people, but it is the undesirable portion that I would exclude. Doubtless there are a number—evidently there is—out of 275,000, a number of worthy ones; but, sir, as I said, I am speaking of the undesirable class of all nationalities, not only in New York, but all over the country, wherever they are found. It may be that in New York you have them under control.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. They need no control.

Mr. HOPKINS. This may be true of your district, where I am informed a large majority are Jews who have come to this country to make it their permanent home, and against all such I would not utter one sentence of disrespect.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question purely for information?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH of Iowa. I would like to know what record the gentleman refers to that shows that people come here in violation of the law, under labor contracts?

Mr. HOPKINS. Yes, sir. You will find this on pages 15 and 23 of Document No. 384, Fifty-ninth Congress.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Does Mr. Braun say that the greater number are of the class which are described by you in your speech, or does Mr. Braun merely mention certain instances?

Mr. HOPKINS. He said in broad terms that three-fifths of the people who come from Austria-Hungary come under contract to perform labor, and a very large per cent return to their mother country. [Loud applause.] He says three-fifths of them.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I am astounded.

Mr. HOPKINS. Well you may be, perhaps, and if you will refer to that report you would be further astounded at the conditions that exist in this country. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, right here I want to prove to you that a very large part of the immigration which has steadily grown since the year of the Chinese exclusion act from southern and eastern Europe and Asia is much more undesirable than that of the Chinaman. He not only possesses all the objectionable features alleged against the Chinaman, but in addition he comes nursing the sentiment of anarchy and sedition, and that his coming is aided and encouraged by the Government he represents, and that during the time he is here secret agencies sent by his Government keep constant watch over him, poisoning his mind against our institutions and alluring him to remain loyal to the mother country.

First, to prove that foreign governments are encouraging their subjects to come here for temporary stay, the Austro-Hungarian Government has made a contract with the Cunard Steamship Company, plying between Fiume and New York, by the terms of which the Government obligates itself to furnish the ship company 30,000 steerage passengers a year for twelve years or pay a penalty of 100 crowns for each one short of that number. In return for this service the ship company appointed the Bureau of Tourists and Travel, an organized company subsidized by the Government for the ostensible purpose of attracting tourists to Austria-Hungary, its sole agent to sell tickets to emigrants coming to the United States, paying said agency 18 crowns for its own service and the further sum of 10 crowns to be paid over to the Government. In order to facilitate the business of the Bureau of Tourists and Travel and to relieve the steamship company of any responsibility for violating the law which forbids any steamship company from encouraging emigration to the United States, this bureau is authorized to name as many subagents as they desire and the Government issues to them a license. They are called "runners" and are paid a commission on every emigrant they can send to the bureau. In order to induce emigrants to come to the United States they tell the most roseate stories of the country, the pleasures of the voyage, and the wonderful success their countrymen have made here. As they are not responsible to anyone and their commission depends solely upon the number they induce to emigrate, they are not particular who they are, but, like all other games of deceit, it is most easily practiced upon the ignorant, weak, and unfortunate, and this is the chief reason why we are daily receiving so many paupers, diseased, depraved and ignorant immigrants, which we may expect to continue until we enact such legislation as will remedy it.

The 10 crowns paid to the Government upon each immigrant coming to the United States is used first to pay the salary of the commissioner of immigration and his inspector, which is small, and the remainder is to keep alive the Magyar spirit among the Hungarians who have come to the United States by building and establishing schools, churches, and homes in New York and in other cities, and to return such Hungarians to their mother country as have failed to make a success and have not the means to pay their own way back. During the year 1904, and largely due to the rate war, ships other than the Cunard Line made a clear profit of $2,000,000 on Hungarian immigrants embarking at other ports than Fiume. This at once attracted the attention of the Government, who, anxious to reap all the profit possible out of the immigration business, at once extended the terms of the contract with the Cunard Line to the North German Lloyd, Hamburg-American, and other steamship lines. Since the date of the contract with the Cunard Line, and up to June, 1905, that steamship company has paid to the Austro-Hungarian Government 2,600,000 crowns, and the North German Lloyd paid her 100,000 crowns during the month of March, 1905. Out of this fund the Hungarian Government has established a home in New York, with an annual subsidy of $6,000 per annum and $2,000 to furnish it. How many other such, together with schools and churches, they have planted among us to teach anti-Americanism, I can not tell. But when I tell you that during the recent visit of Herr Franz Kaltenbrunn, imperial and royal councilor of the ministry of the interior of Austria, he visited every place where Austrians were grouped in colonies, urging them not to become American citizens, but to remain loyal to the mother country, and by the practice of industry and frugality be able soon to return to the land of their birth with the money they had gathered here, and when called to speak to the Austrian Association in New York City, made this statement:

> That in view of the fact that this association is liberally subsidized by the Austrian Government, it should extend no aid or assistance to any but such Austrians as actually remain Austrian subjects, though residing in this country.

The Rev. Bela Lorick, a Hungarian priest, while officiating at the dedication of a Hungarian Roman Catholic Church at Connellsville, Pa., on the 16th day of July, 1905, made these statements:

> It is not the first time that I open my lips before you, dear brethren and compatriots, for since one and a half years am I laboring here with you in loving mission, to the end that we may create for ourselves, true believing Hungarians, in this truly weakening valley, a house of the Lord, which is the entrance to heaven, for the salvation of our souls and for the fostering and redeeming of our Magyar national spirit and sentiment in the midst of this hundredfold conglomeration of nationalities.
>
> My God, here in America, in this godless atmosphere, where nothing is holy and everything is business, a small number of Hungarians have done wonders.
>
> The Hungarian people must not deny themselves; but, on the contrary, even though living in Africa or Australia, among the savage pagans, they must not forget their sweet fatherland, the one-thousand-year-old beautiful Magyar land, spotted with thousands of hills and filled with balmy air, where the black bread that is wetted by our tears is sweeter than here the finest honeyed cakes and pastries.

The dissemination of such statements with their evil effect, coming as they do from the head of both state and church, should not be tolerated in our land. The most effective way to accomplish this is to remove the cause. Make it impossible for strangers to plunder our household under the guise of friendship, which they are systematically doing every day. It is not exaggerating to say that fully one-half of all the emigrants who come to this country from Italy, Austria-Hungary, Greece, and Turkey do not intend to make it their permanent home, and every influence of the power of church and state is used to insure their return with the booty they have gathered, in dollars they have earned, which rightly belong to our own laboring people. In support of this statement I have but to turn to the report of Immigration Inspector Marcus Braun, who was specially detailed by the Bureau of Commerce and Labor to visit the foreign countries from which we are receiving emigrants and study and report to find the cause, explaining why we are receiving such an unusual number of emigrants from Italy, Austria-Hungary, Russia, Greece, Turkey, etc. His first report was made August 12, 1904, and the second one June 13, 1905. Each of these reports contained such surprising revelations as to the means resorted to by foreign governments to flagrantly abuse the privileges accorded by our Government to foreigners that it was thought best to suppress them. Consequently they were not made public until called for by a resolution of this House adopted on the 6th day of January, 1906.

He makes the unqualified statement that Italy, Austria-Hungary, and Greece use all kinds of means to induce their subjects to emigrate to the United States for temporary sojourn, with the ultimate purpose of returning with all their earnings, and that they try to keep them grouped together as much as possible in order to maintain their influence over them and prevent them as far as possible from being converted to American ideas and citizenship.

He says that south Italy is so poor and overcrowded that if their present system of emigration to the United States was checked it is the almost universal dread among the people that it would cause inevitable famine and not unlikely rebellion. This is not surprising, when he tells us in the next breath that Italian bankers and steamship agents told him that Italy received annually from the United States an average of $1 a day for every Italian who comes to this country for temporary sojourn. It is not, therefore, surprising that she should use every available means to retain her influence over her subjects while in the United States. And, as he says, she sends on every steamer leaving her ports for the United States a royal commissioner, whose mission is to coach and instruct Italian emigrants, so as to insure their entry and also to impress upon them the importance of retaining their allegiance to the mother country and not become American citizens.

I have already made some reference to the manner in which Austria-Hungary is prostituting her character as a nation and the imposition she is inflicting upon a friendly power by the methods she pursues to wrong and despoil us, which is nothing short of a disgrace upon her civilization.

When we are reminded that during the year 1904 $50,000,000 went to Austria-Hungary from her subjects in the United States, you need not be surprised at the unwarranted, unscrupulous and extraordinary means resorted to by her to continue this flow of wealth, and that Sigmund Kornfeld, director of the Hungarian Credit Bank, goes about the country speaking and lecturing in favor of wholesale emigration to the United States. He painted in glowing terms the splendid opportunities afforded the Hungarian immigrant here, offering as proof of this statement that there had passed through his bank alone in the last year 139,000,000 crowns sent home by Hungarian subjects in the United States. In one of these lectures he grew so enthusiastic over the thoughts of the great profit his country was realizing from this new and novel enterprise, that he exclaimed:

> Let all go who can earn all the money they can, learn the practical ways of the American laborer, and come home with both money and experience.

The public press is also a strong factor in organizing and promoting this heretofore unknown or unheard of foreign raid upon our institutions, and Commissioner Braun charges that the Hungarian Government maintains subsidized papers, published in foreign language, in the United States for the twofold purpose of, first, inducing immigration here, and then keeping alive the native spirit so as to insure the return to the mother country with the rich spoils gathered here.

In one of the semiofficial organs of Austria-Hungary, under date July 26, 1904, it was stated that Hungarian peasants returning from the United States had purchased in one county alone 10,158 acres of land for the sum of 1,874,917 crowns of American-earned money. It was also stated that after a given time the Government would only charge half fare to prospective emigrants over the railroads.

He further discloses the fact that there is an organization in the United States giving material aid to this movement, such as steamship agents, publishers of newspapers in foreign languages, would-be bankers, etc., who not only send to foreign countries their publications giving glowing accounts of the chances to make money here, but they actually travel in foreign countries giving public lectures in which they propose to establish homes and banks in the United States in which emigrants can deposit their money and to negotiate land sales in Hungary with their American-earned money. So complete is this scheme that a chart is published showing all the available land in Hungary, which is being offered to prospective emigrants at most reasonable prices. It is plain to read between the lines that the real agency behind this movement is the Hungarian Government.

Commissioner Braun says that in interviews with no less than twenty-five members of the Hungarian Parliament they admitted that their Government was adopting active measures to maintain connection with the people residing in the United States, such as the publication of newspapers in foreign languages, alleged bankers, priests, ministers, teachers, and private individuals with whom their Government is in constant touch, with the one view of maintaining their control over her emigrants to this country.

Through these several channels hundreds of thousands of printed cards are annually sent to foreign countries and posts of embarkation, giving full detail of the extraordinary efforts taken by these agencies to look after the welfare of emigrants. From the home countries are sent thousands of national flags and hundreds of thousands of copies of patriotic literature, priests, ministers, and teachers to keep alive the native spirit and to prevent their subjects from falling into the ways of the American people and failing to return to the fatherland, adding to its wealth their earnings of American money.

The astounding revelation is contained in this report that there are now at least 500 priests and ministers in the United States who are not American citizens and whose only mission is to teach and plead with their countrymen not to forsake their native country and become citizens of this, which one of them has proclaimed to be "this godless hemisphere where nothing is holy, but all is business." To prove the statement that these men are not chosen and sent here because of their fitness to look after the spiritual welfare of their people, but because of their ability to exercise the temporal control of their home governments over them and to prevent their assimilation with American ideas of freedom and independence, which, once tasted, would strangely induce in them a desire to enjoy the full measure of its blessings by becoming American citizens. This was the purpose which induced the Hungarian Government in the year 1902 to issue a document to the Roman Catholic bishops of Hungary requesting them not to send any other than very strongly patriotically inclined Magyar priests to America. Of course, this was intended to be a secret communication, but through some means it became known and was published in some of our papers. Such revelations as these justify the charge that the influence of the church is being subordinated to commercialism by these governments. In the countries from which these ministers, priests, and teachers come no one except a loyal citizen is allowed to practice these callings; foreigners are not.

Encouraged by their great success in securing immigrants from Austria-Hungary and the handsome revenue paid by the steamship companies, these agents and subagents have extended their field of operations in Servia, Montenegro, Bulgaria, and Macedonia, from which countries we have not had any immigration until very recently. These countries have no emigration laws.

Greece, which is practically without emigration laws, is also a fruitful field for the operation of the steamship ticket agents. Strange to say we have a rigid law against the importation of contract labor, and but a few immigrants are refused admission because of that objection. A semiofficial organ of the Austrian Government makes the statement that three-fifths of the emigrants who come from that country to the United States come under contract, adding: "God forbid that the American Government should read this."

Commissioner Braun say that nearly all the immigrants from Servia, Montenegro, Bulgaria, Macedonia, Greece, and Syria come to this country under contract. It is boldly stated in Greece by the agent of the White Star Steamship Company that every emigrant coming from that country has his place secured in advance and starts to work the day he arrives at his destination. Many of these are boys from 10 to 18 years of age, and are brought under contract to work and have their transportation paid. These are usually brought by their older compatriots, who have a monopoly on the bootblack stands in our large cities. During the last four months of the year 1904, 898 of these youths arrived at the port of Boston alone; 127 of them had not been sufficiently coached to conceal their mission, and were returned because they came in violation of that law. A journey through the bootblack stands in this, our nation's capital, will convince you that there is ground to suspicion that a species of white slavery exists here which our officials have so far been unable to break up.

The thirst for gain which has so signalized the steamship agent in southern and eastern Europe has carried him to the Far East, where in Syria he is able to ply his avocation with profit to himself, but serious detriment to us. It is a generally conceded fact that these are the most undesirable of all our immigrants, as they are recognized to be professional liars and intriguants, and 90 per cent of them return to their native country after a few years, stay here, taking with them an average of $1,000, which they have in different ways gathered together. It is from Syria that women are brought to act as peddlers of cheap jewelry and other light articles of merchandise, because they can gain admittance to a house where a man would be turned away. They come under contract, and the day they arrive here they are supplied with a pack and start out to do the country. Instances are related where mothers have left young children and come here, staying long enough to make money enough to return home, pay off mortgages on her home, and support her family. It is a common expression in Syria when a new house is seen, or a new roof, or otherwise repaired, that the owner has lately returned from America or is still there and sending money home.

Mr. Chairman, right here is a good place to make a pertinent inquiry, which is this: Out of whose pockets does the money come to build and repair these homes in Syria; to purchase the 10,000 acres of farm land in a single county in Hungary—the stupendous sum, equivalent to $1 per day for every Italian subject in the United States who is a day laborer, which annually goes to Italy and the fifty millions to Hungary? The answer is easy. Every dollar of these sums was paid for wages to foreign laborers, and therefore comes directly out of the pockets of the American workingmen. The houses built and repaired in Egypt, the farms purchased in Hungary, and the millions sent to Italy and Hungary coming from their wage-earners while temporarily here means that many less homes and comforts for our own worthy laboring men.

Mr. Chairman, we are told every day that the cardinal principle of the Republican party is and has always been protection to American industries and American labor; that by levying a duty on articles of foreign manufacture, the product of cheap foreign labor, coming into our markets in competition with the products of our factories, made by intelligent, well-paid American labor, our manufacturers would be enabled to sell their products high enough to permit them to pay their laborers a scale of wages much higher than those paid to the poorly fed, poorly clothed, poorly housed, and poorly paid laborers in other countries.

To do this meant an increase of prices on all goods purchased and consumed in the United States, but as it was the declared purpose of such a law to better the condition of the laboring men of our country it has been acquiesced in by a majority of the people until now we find ourselves confronted by entirely changed conditions, brought about, as it is claimed, largely by the manufacturers of protected articles who, greedy for still greater profits, clandestinely aid in the importation of contract labor from Europe, with which they are filling the places of American labor at reduced prices, so that the American laborer, who was intended to be a beneficiary of this protection system, now wakes up to find that the cheap labor of foreign countries, against whom he could not compete, are in large numbers knocking at the doors of factories, workshops, and mines, asking to supplant him and to be allowed to take their places at a lower scale of wages. In this way the menace from foreign cheap labor, which the country has been taught by the advocates of protection to fear, has been transferred from foreign countries to our own hearthstone; and the American laborer is confronted with the proposition that he has to pay protection prices for everything he buys, while the only thing he has to sell, with the proceeds of which to buy, is his labor, and that the price of this is daily in danger of decrease and absolute loss from the cheap and poorly paid laborers of other countries who are daily being dumped on our shores by the thousands, who never in their lives received a fair wage, and whose poor and destitute condition compels them to seek work at any price.

Mr. Chairman, the whole situation is capable of but one solution, and that is larger profits and more money for the wealthy manufacturer and less wages and fewer family comforts for the American laboring man. Then if you are the friend of the poor man, reduce the schedules on imported goods so that he will have a chance to purchase them as cheaply in proportion as his wages are reduced by the competition with these foreign immigrants, and amend your laws so as to make impossible this system of peonage and commercial immigration, which means no good for anyone and ruin for our wage-earner. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, this is not an imaginary evil which confronts us, but a real one, and the country is fast working up so that a spirit of unrest is widespread among our people, not only prompted by dread of labor disasters, but of the inoculation of disease not only into our families, but into the body politic as well. Prior to the eighties, when the tide of our immigration changed from northern to southern Europe, labor troubles were few and strikes were practically unknown. But since their advent in any considerable numbers the country has been the scene of almost constant social turmoil, the result of innumerable strikes and lockouts, attended with violence and destruction, not only of the lives and property of private individuals, but oftentimes breeding a contempt for the law and a desire to accomplish its overthrow, culminating in such tragic scenes as the Haymarket massacre, the assassination of President McKinley, the assassination of ex-Governor Steunenberg, of Idaho, and the currently reported plot against the lives of ex-Governor Peabody, as well as Governor Pennypacker, of Pennsylvania, and Governor Pattison, of Ohio.

The only cause of complaint against any of these victims is that they represented and upheld the law. These are but some of the evidences of the spirit of anarchy born of oppression and the misrule of centuries in the Old World, which comes to us as the pledge of loyalty and appreciation from these new-found friends. Strange to say that while our laws deny this class of people entry to our ports, our officers in the last twelve years have been able to detect but two of them. These came from south Italy, one in 1904, and the other in 1905. The following table is referred to for information as to the excluded classes:

A high official in Washington, in close touch with the immigration of the country, is my authority for the statement that nearly every immigrant from south Italy is more or less imbued with the spirit of anarchism, and that it is with these people that we have introduced such dreaded and deadly organizations as the Mafia, the Vendetta, "Black Hand," and kindred anarchist organizations into the United States.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman for his authority for the statement that nine-tenths of the immigration from southern Italy comes here imbued with anarchistic ideas?

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. Chairman, I don't know whether I have the authority to give the source of my information, but will say it comes to me from a high official engaged in the immigration bureau of this country. I know nothing of the fact myself.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I desire to say to the gentleman that I believe he is thoroughly in the wrong. We have a great deal of that class of immigrants in New York City, and I desire to say that the statement which he makes is not true of one-tenth of 1 per cent of the Italian immigration.

Mr. HOPKINS. Well, Mr. Chairman, I don't know whether the gentleman is in their secrets or not, but it took a wholesale hanging in the city of New Orleans in 1889 to develop how many were in it there, and it will take a wholesale hanging over in Pennsylvania, where only last week it was developed that dozens and scores of these people had not only committed murder of their own people, but had entered into a plot against the life of the governor of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I think the gentleman misapprehends. I am not a Representative from the State of Pennsylvania, but from New York, and so far as we are concerned in New York I don't think this fact is true, and I do not make this statement for the purpose of interrupting the gentleman, because I know from his appearance before our committee he is earnest——

Mr. HOPKINS. Does the gentleman know I am wrong?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I do not say that, but I know you are thoroughly in earnest, and I want to make a statement in the same spirit that as far as New York State is concerned the Italian element is as law-abiding citizens, and in about the same degree, as other citizens of the State of New York are.

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not know. We get some terrible reports about New York through the public press, but I know nothing of them myself. Of course, you do right to defend your home and the people whom you represent, and you would not do right if you did not defend them, but we would not go to New York to find a model citizenship if, as you say, the Italian element is as law abiding as its other citizenship. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. BENNET of New York. Our ideas of model citizenship differ, but you come to New York for almost everything else. As far as my district is concerned there are not 150 Italians in the whole of my district, to the best of my knowledge.

Mr. HOPKINS. If you haven't more than a hundred and fifty, then you may be justified in your statement.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I want to ask the gentleman this question: How many immigrants has he in his whole Congressional district?

Mr. HOPKINS. We have not very many, but we want to shut our doors before we get them. We do not want to have this trouble you and the rest of the country realize now. We do not want this strike element or pauper element or anarchistic element. We do not want men to come from foreign countries to do the labor which our people at home can do. We do not want our people reduced to the level of the pauper labor of Europe. We do not want to deprive our people of an opportunity of earning American wages and living according to American standards. [Appaluse.]

Mr. BENNET of New York. Our mechanics, artisans, and skilled laborers in the city of New York are higher paid men than any other men in similar avocations west of——

Mr. HOPKINS. What per cent of the whole number are the higher paid men?

Mr. BENNET of New York. We have more artisans and high-priced men in our city than the whole State of Kentucky combined.

Mr. HOPKINS. You may have, because you have such a large population as well as wealth, and naturally you would have in proportion a larger number of skilled workmen. We are not objecting to this class of people.

Mr. BENNET of New York. And they get the high wages, too.

Mr. HOPKINS. How many have you got up there who are living in sweat shops to-day, who are eking out an existence and barely earning their bread?

Mr. BENNET of New York. By the law of the State of New York there can not be a man, woman, or child living in a sweat shop, and no one lives there.

Mr. HOPKINS. Is that law enforced? That is the claim that comes from every paper published in your State, sir, that your laws are not enforced [applause] and are not carried out. I must decline to yield further to the gentleman.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I will state it is in force and there is not a person living in a sweat shop in New York.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am glad that some one denies the existence of such unwholesome conditions anywhere in our country.

Mr. BENNET of New York. We have thirty-seven who defend it.

Mr. HOPKINS. For the benefit of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET], who seems to have such high opinion of the Italian immigrant, I want to say that I should like to think he was right. But his opinion is badly refuted by the following clipping from the Washington Post under date of January 24, 1906:

MONONGAHELA, PA., January 24, 1906.

Warrants were issued to-day for the arrest of 136 foreigners, believed to be members of a band of anarchists, whose headquarters, at Baird, Pa., were raided by the police early Tuesday morning and a mass of literature threatening the life of Governor Pennybacker, of Pennsylvania; Governor Pattison, of Ohio, and other prominent men in different parts of the United States was found. According to the police, the members of the organization are scattered over a large area, and it will take several days to serve the warrants. Secret-service officers from Pittsburg and other points are here to-day to assist in the apprehension of the foreigners. The charge against the men is conspiracy against the Government.

PATERSON, N. J., January 24, 1906.

The police of this city to-day conducted a search for accomplices in the plot to assassinate Governor Pennypacker, of Pennsylvania; Governor Pattison, of Ohio, and other leading men. Information has been sent here that letters which were found at Baird, Pa., yesterday, named among other intended victims both of these governors and bore the Paterson (N. J.) postmark. Some of these letters were apparently sent from an organization known as Liberta Sociologia, located at 495 Madison avenue, this city.

The house at this number on Madison avenue is the only one in the block. The only occupants which the police found in it to-day were two Italian silk weavers and their families. Both these men told the police that they had no knowledge of a society called Liberta Sociologia or of the letters said to have been found at Baird, Pa.

WASHINGTON, PA., January 24, 1906.

While Washington County officers were hunting to-day for leaders of the gang of anarchists whose existence was revealed yesterday, a meeting of the society was held this afternoon at Courtney, about 2 miles north of Monongahela. Knowing that nothing was suspected at this place, leaders of the "Reds," who are charged with various conspiracies gathered in a saloon and with impassioned speeches urged the members of the society to resist arrest and conceal their fellow-members wherever possible.

Vincenzio Valdi and Petro Guiseppo, leaders of the band, are said to have made fiery addresses, in which they urged their countrymen to carry out their prearranged plot of assassination and not to be intimidated by officers. They advised the Italians, it is reported, to use every means possible to overthrow the Government. "Use bloodshed, if necessary," said Valdi, and Guiseppo reiterated his advice. The meeting lasted until about 5 o'clock, the Italians then quietly dispersing.

The officers did not learn of the meeting until it was too late to apprehend any of the leaders.

One startling disclosure of the day was the discovery that Judge J. F. Taylor, of the Washington County court, had been threatened by the "Black Hand." During the campaign preceding the November election, when Judge Taylor was a candidate for reelection, he received two letters warning him that the society was working against him, and that he was in danger. It developed that the decree ordering his death was never issued, as influential Italians persuaded the organization that an attempt on his life would only balk the more important conspiracy involving the assassination of more prominent men.

The county authorities stated to-night that they have almost indisputable evidence that the death of two prominent Italians in this county recently was due to the planning of this band. Assistant District Attorney C. L. V. Acheson, who has taken personal charge of the trailing of the leaders of the gang, has secured evidence that the anarchistic society has practically honeycombed the county.

Mr. Chairman, while I am on this subject I want to give some other reasons why we should stop this wholesale and indiscriminate immigration, for it is not only filling up the country with conspirators against all forms of law, but is filling our prisons, almshouses, and asylums, entailing extra burdens upon our people.

In 1904 there were 44,668 alien inmates in our penal reformatory and charitable institutions. Of this number 4,011 were criminals of grave offenses, 5,664 were criminals of minor offenses, 20,389 were insane, and 14,604 were paupers. The number of insane are life patients to which can be added 5,000 more from the table. The city of New York is charged with the burden of 6,000 of these unfortunate people. The following table shows that more than half of these people are in but four States:

Location.	Character of institution and number of inmates in each.		Alien inmates.
New York	Insane	5,952
	Penal	2,283
	Charitable	4,205
			12,440
Pennsylvania	Insane	1,352
	Penal	1,265
	Charitable	2,984
			5,601
Massachusetts	Insane	2,304
	Penal	1,430
	Charitable	1,756
			5,490
Illinois	Insane	2,478
	Penal	227
	Charitable	654

Of the number confined for criminal offenses, 809 are murderers, 253 of whom are Italians; 373 are confined for attempted murder, and 139 of these are Italians. Of all the aliens confined in our criminal and penal institutions in 1904, 32 per cent of them were of the Celtic and Teutonic races of northern and western Europe, and 64 per cent were Slavic and Iberic races of southern and eastern Europe.

In 1905 the total number of all inmates was 349,885. Of this number, 97,074, 28 per cent were foreign born. Of these, 39,646 are aliens, while the remaining 57,424 have been naturalized. The foreign-born population of the United States, including both alien and naturalized, is only 14 per cent of the whole population. In other words, while they furnish only a little more than one seventh of our population, they furnish nearly one-third of our criminals, insane, and paupers.

Further demonstrating the undesirability of the large majority of our immigration, I append hereto a table showing the illiteracy and poverty of these people:

Race or people.	Illiteracy, 14 years and over.		Immigrants bringing—		Total amount of money shown.	Have been in the United States before.

Total	8,209	230,882	111,652	679,565	25,159,012	175,624

This table shows that out of the total immigration for 1905, 8,209 of them who are 14 years of age and over can read but can not write, that 230,882 above that age can neither read nor write. This table also shows that the whole number brought $25,159,012, which, if equally divided, would give each person $24.60. That 111,652 of them brought over $50 each, and that 679,565 brought less than $50 each, while 235,282, representing minors and dependents, did not bring any money. Fifty thousand eight hundred and sixty-five English brought $2,924,080, or an average of $57 per capita, while 46,030 Magyars brought $695,108, an average of $15 per capita. Eighty-two thousand three hundred and sixty Germans brought $3,600,845, an average of $44 per capita, while 186,390 South Italians brought $3,127,207, an average of $16 per head.

The following table shows the relative percentage of illiteracy of the people of northern and western Europe to those of southern and eastern Europe:

	Per cent.
English	1
German	4
Scandinavian	1
Irish	3
Scotch	1
Welsh	4
French	3
Polish	40
South Italian	56
Slovak	25
Lithuanian	57
Greek	23
Russian	33
Portuguese	67

The low type of people, as is indicated by the foregoing statement of amount of money owned and percentage of illiteracy, compose almost two-thirds of last year's immigrants, and makes it easy for the home governments to group and control them as their subjects in this country.

Having quoted the statement of Commissioner Braun that it was the policy of foreign governments to group their subjects in colonies in this country in order that they might more effectively retain their control over them through their ministers, priests, teachers, etc., and more effectively and certainly secure their return with their booty, I will give the following facts taken from the report of Commissioner-General of Immigration to sustain this statement:

In 1904 the total immigration to the United States was 840,714.

Of this number, 541,979 (67 per cent) settled in the North Atlantic States, as follows:

State.	Number.	Per cent.
New York	263,150	32
New Jersey	41,780	5
Pennsylvania	146,478	18
Massachusetts	58,411	7
Connecticut	18,526	2

Fifty-seven thousand four hundred and fifty (7 per cent) went to Illinois; 33,077 (4 per cent) to Ohio. In these States are the largest of our cities.

In 1905 the total number coming to the United States was 1,026,499. Of this number 699,340 (68 per cent) settled in the North Atlantic division.

State.	Number.	Per cent.
New York	315,511	31
New Jersey	57,258	5
Pennsylvania	210,708	20
Massachusetts	71,159	7
Connecticut	26,174	2

Of the remainder, 72,770 (7 per cent) went to Illinois and 49,351 (5 per cent) to Ohio.

In 1904 50 per cent of the entire immigration settled in New York and Pennsylvania, and in 1905 51 per cent settled in the same States. The remarkable feature in the question of distribution of the large numbers of immigrants is that less than 10 per cent of them went to the rich agricultural States of the Northwest in either of these years or even during the year 1903.

And practically none of them go to the South.

I here desire to have inserted a letter which I have to-day received from the Immigration Restriction League, of Boston, Mass., which shows the growing interest in this question:

IMMIGRATION RESTRICTION LEAGUE,
Boston, Mass., February 20, 1906.

Hon. FRANK A. HOPKINS,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: It was with much interest and pleasure that we read the immigration bill (H. R. 14602) which you introduced on the 12th instant. With every one of its provisions we thoroughly agree and sincerely hope that they will become a law before the end of this session. I beg of you to let us know if any way occurs to you in which we can be of use in making public opinion felt so that needed legislation along the lines of your bill can be secured.

For several years the league has been engaged in a quiet effort to secure the further judicious regulation of immigration by improving its character and securing more assimilative immigrants, not only as to quality, but also as to quantity, along the very lines of your bill. Under separate cover we are sending you some of our publications and beg of you to look them over, for we feel certain they contain matter of interest to you in this field.

We believe that your stand on this question is in perfect accord, not only with the attitude of the North, but also with the attitude of the South. The southern demand for labor has been misconstrued by certain selfish interests into a demand for indiscriminate immigration, as is shown by the numerous canvasses of the wishes of the South as to immigration, which have been made recently by disinterested persons, organizations, and newspapers. The results of the first one of these were published in the Manufacturer's Record, of Baltimore, on July 20, and showed the South to be very discriminating and to be very much opposed to the introduction of western Asiatics and southeast Europeans. With this conclusion, the Tradesman, of Chattanooga, the leading trade paper of the South, which certainly understands the needs and wants of the South, is in thorough accord and constantly runs matter in favor of immediate legislation.

The league has also made a canvass. It sent out over 5,000 letters to various State and local officials and representative citizens all over the South. The results showed a deep-rooted hostility to the illiterate classes from southeast Europe and a decided preference for Americans and a desire only for aliens from northwestern Europe. The newcomers most wanted everywhere was the small family with some money that would settle in the rural districts.

With regard to further legislation, there was striking unanimity in favor of the exclusion of illiterates, persons of poor physique, imbeciles, persons desirous of settling in the cities and averse to country life, and in favor of increasing the head tax.

These results are borne out by the various conferences which have been held, practically all of which were promoted in their inception by foreign interests—employers of cheap labor and certain transportation interests. On June 19 the Alabama immigration conference, which met at Birmingham, passed strong resolutions in favor of the exclusion of illiterates, persons of poor physique, etc. Similar action was taken by the Farmers' National Congress at Richmond, Va., on September 14. On November 8, the Alabama Industrial and Commercial Association adopted the thorough-going report of its committee calling for restrictive legislation.

It is sometimes said that existing laws are sufficient. In refutation of this I beg to submit a few new immigration figures. The last report of the Massachusetts State Board of Charities shows that since 1900 there have been 1,723 cases of foreign paupers in Massachusetts, for whom the Commonwealth has been reimbursed $19,613. Massachusetts prison records show that the foreign born, who are less than one-third of the total population, furnish three times as many prisoners as those of native birth and parentage, and that the foreign element furnishes five times as many criminals as the native born.

According to the commissioner-general's report there are about 45,000 aliens confined in public institutions of the United States, two-thirds of whom are of the Slavic-Iberic races of southeast Europe. Out of 800 aliens now confined for murder, 253 are Italians, and out of 273 confined for attempts at murder, 139 are Italians.

Magistrate Wahle, of New York City, has just made his report on crime, and says that the increase in arraignments last year of 18,388 is due entirely to persons born in southeast Europe. He also shows that there were 2,450 more persons arrested for felony in 1905 than in 1904 in New York City.

In Chicago recently there have been two stirring public anticrime meetings and an anticrime league formed. According to the 1905 report of the New York State Lunacy Commission, there was last year in New York State an increase in insanity of 20 per cent, which Doctor Spitzka says is due to the fact that New York City is unfortunately the port of entry for the bulk of our present immigration. Ninety per cent of the applicants for poor relief in New York City last year were of foreign extraction.

With regard to the recent large increase of idiotic, insane, and poverty stricken, referred to by the Commissioner-General in his report, Mr. Broughton Brandenburg, writing in Charities, says that they are "part and parcel of thousands of insane and idiotic persons turned over to the Cunard Line to fill the contract which the Hungarian Government secretly made with it, to supply immigrants to the line, with an alleged number of 30,000 per year."

The steamship companies seem to be making a great deal of the number of tickets which they claim to have sold last year for outward passage. Of the 1,026,499 aliens that entered the country last year, only 175,624 had ever been in the United States before. Consequently there was, at the very least, a net alien addition to our population last year by immigration of 850,875 immigrants.

Have you noticed that only 8 per cent of last year's 1,000,000 influx went to the thirty-six States and Territories south of the Potomac and west of the Mississippi rivers? The previous year 10 per cent went to those sections. The point is that the present immigration is a community-living, sweat-shop-working people that will not go out into the rural districts and settle the country, as previous immigrations from northwestern Europe did and would at present if it were not for the coming and competition of the classes now entering the country.

Knowing your interest in the immigration question, I have taken this liberty of writing you at some length, trusting that my letter would contain matter of interest to you. I hope that you will find time to look over, at least, publications Nos. 30, 33, and 43, which I am sending you, as I feel certain that they contain matter of interest to you.

Hoping that this is not too much of an intrusion upon your good time, and begging of you to send me copies of any speeches that you may deliver on the question, I am, sir,

Most sincerely, yours, J. H. PATTEN, Assistant Secretary.

Mr. Chairman, the spirit of commercialism which has of recent years so largely displaced the spirit of patriotism, which once induced immigrants to seek homes among us, is producing evil results in still other ways than those which I have mentioned. I refer to the frauds practiced to acquire citizenship and the fraudulent uses of naturalization papers.

The report of the United States district attorney for southern district of New York shows that two Italians had esablished themselves in New York and were regularly engaged in the wholesale issue of fraudulent naturalization certificates and placing them on the market through secret allies; that many of them are sent to Italy, where they are sold for good prices. Through the efforts of our officers these men have been caught and convicted, and 1,916 of their forged certificates have been detected and canceled. Not only are foreigners engaged in these frauds, but citizens and officers of the United States are also flagrantly violating the law, as shown by the following memoranda, now on file in the Department of Justice in this city, which accidentally fell into my hands:

CONFIDENTIAL MEMORANDUM.

Hon. C. B. Witmer, of Sunbury, Pa., stated as follows, January 26, 1906:

That in Northumberland County, Pa., during the year 1901, from 1,500 to 1,700 aliens were naturalized; that in one day over 300 were made citizens, and that at the present time the abuse continues. He further stated that the son of a local judge has his office next door to the court over which his father presides, and that he receives a fee of $10 for each alien naturalized, and no questions are asked so long as the fee is forthcoming. The son appears in court and hands up the papers to his father, who signs the necessary documents without questioning the sufficiency of the evidence as to the right of the alien to be naturalized.

He further stated that he would be willing to give the information to a trusted representative of the Government who would call on him at Sunbury, but he did not desire to make any public announcement because he is required to practice before the judge, and he is also a fellow-townsman. The abuses have grown so in number that he feels it his duty as a friend of the Administration to give this information.

These are but some of the abuses, which are by far too many for me to go into detail. Before I leave the subject I wish to say that 16 per cent of all the persons who become naturalized citizens of the United States leave within six months thereafter. A great many of them are subjects of Turkey, and not in favor with their Government, and that they only take out naturalization papers in order to return home, and under the protection of being American citizens defy the Turkish Government while they engage in keeping gambling houses and other places forbidden by law.

Mr. Braun says many instances of this kind came under view while in Turkey, both in Europe and in Asia. That in the city of Jerusalem more than a thousand of these patent-made American citizens live, very few of whom can speak a word of English, and that they are constantly involving our Government in trouble with foreign countries.

The following table shows the annual immigration, by countries, since the year 1856, and is offered to show the very decided change in recent years in the source of our immigration:

b Beginning with 1899, Polish immigrants have been included in the countries to which they belong.

Mr. Chairman, having presented the abuses of our present system of immigration, it is in order to suggest a remedy. I have introduced a bill which, I think, if enacted into a law, will greatly cure the evil.

First, it contains a provision providing for an educational test, but very easy to comply with, as it only requires persons over 16 years of age to be able to read, although this would have excluded 230,882 persons who were admitted last year, of whom 202,445 came from southern and eastern Europe.

Another provision of the bill excludes children under 16 years of age unless accompanied by parents or guardian. This is intended to stop the traffic in boys who are being brought here in violation of the contract-labor law.

Another provision prohibits the admission of all persons who have not as much as $30. This would debar quite a large number from southern and eastern Europe, who are now pouring into the United States, and because they have no money with which to get farther into the country, settle in New York and Pennsylvania and other North Atlantic States, causing a congestion in the great centers of population, which is taxing all the ingenuity of both municipal and State authorities to lessen the many evils consequent upon such a condition.

Being without the means of support, in a strange land, they of necessity are crowded like cattle into cheap tenements, and take work at any price offered them. In this way they become the competitors of our labor, and do of necessity supplant many an American who can not live upon the wages they are glad to accept. It is this class who are easiest grouped into colonies by the foreign governments for the purpose of retaining their control over them. It is in these inhospitable abodes where vice is bred, and the anarchist finds receptive minds to accept his dread teachings, where the Mafia, the Vendetta, Black Hand, and kindred organizations meet and plot against the lives of unoffending officials, simply because they stand for the law.

Mr. Chairman, it has been proposed to remedy this evil by increasing the head tax. I am opposed to this plan, for this Government should not go into the business of speculating off of people who are worthy of becoming good citizens. By taking their means of support from them you only perpetrate the evils I am now deploring, and whatever sum would be thus realized would have to be expended to care for the needs of some and punish the evil deeds of others, while to leave it with them would leave them in a position to select their future homes and take care of themselves until they can secure employment. No, if we are to receive them, let us not despoil them and thereby lessen their chances of becoming fit for citizenship. Let the test be worthy manhood and womanhood and not paltry dollars and cents. [Applause.]

This bill also provides for the creation of a board of medical examiners at each of the principal ports of embarkation, whose duty will be to examine all persons seeking passage to the United States, with a view of discovering whether they can or can not be admitted to the United States. The report of Commissioner Braun says that at a number of foreign ports hundreds of sick and diseased persons who apply for passage are placed in the hospitals under the control of the steamship companies and kept only long enough to be patched up sufficiently to enable them to gain admittance to the United States.

The fact that we are daily admitting immigrants who are weak, diseased, and of poor physique accounts for the large number of dependents, insane, and paupers among our foreign population. If this evil is not arrested, it will in time have a degenerate effect upon the health and strength, the manhood and womanhood, of our whole people, of whom we boast as the perfection of an assimilation of the best bloods of the strongest, bravest, hardiest, and most intelligent people of the world.

The Government encourages us to improve the blood of our flocks and herds by admitting free of duty breeding stock. For this purpose hundreds of thousands of dollars are sent abroad every year to buy the purest bred and highest types of horses, cattle, hogs, and sheep, etc., that we may cross them with our own and thereby cause them to attain the highest commercial value. If we are justified and repaid for improving the blood of our dumb brutes, how much greater is the necessity of our keeping our own blood pure, strong, and healthy, which alone can insure our further progress, development, and perpetuity as a nation?

In addition to correcting this evil, the board will be in position to detect many a criminal and anarchist, as well as those seeking admission in violation of the contract-labor laws. Under the present law, the only check we have on these debarred classes is through the boards of inspection at our ports of entry, who have to rely very largely on the statements of the immigrants themselves, and it is the almost invariable rule that those having defects debarring them are coached in such a way as to deceive the officers and gain admission.

The bill also provides for the publication of our immigration laws in foreign languages and for their distribution through the countres from which we get our immigrants. This will at least place it within the reach of foreigners to become acquainted with our laws and to be able to judge for themselves whether they are admissible or not, and not be, as many of them now are, the dupes of unscrupulous ticket agents who get all they have for passage to this country, and when they get here find for the first time when they are refused entry and ordered deported that they have been the victims of misplaced confidence. Instances are given where families have been separated by the admission of some and the deportation of others, causing the most heart-rending scenes, for which our Government is responsible through the inefficiency of our laws.

Mr. Chairman, before closing, I want to refer to two other important statements made in the report of Mr. Braun. One of them is that Germany does not allow Russians or Hungarians to enter her territory, and when any such are found they are at once taken in charge by an officer and required to state their business, and if found to be a person seeking to reach a port of embarkation, they are at once conducted to the nearest port and kept in charge of the officials until placed on board the vessel. During all this time they are not allowed to enter any cities or towns or commingle with the German people. The chief reason for this is that the German Government is in constant dread of the disease so common among these people.

Now, if Germany, which is next-door neighbor to these people, and should be presumed to know most about them, should so discourage their presence in their Empire, and that her officials should give as a reason why the German immigrants have so largely ceased to come to the United States is because they can not compete with these people in wages, manners, and customs of living, is it not time that we should take steps not only to guard our country against disease but our Government against an element constantly plotting against it and planning its overthrow, as well as the possibility of the ultimate reduction of American laborers to the level in wages and manner of living of these abject peoples from foreign lands, for whose unfortunate condition we are not responsible?

Now, Mr. Chairman, charity begins at home, and we should first give earnest thought to our own people who have to work for their bread, who are our neighbors and kin, and have intrusted us with the responsibility of protecting their interest. In these days of our too often vaunted prosperity we are likely to forget that they can not last always or to realize that the other extreme is sure to follow, and when depression does come who are the greatest sufferers?

The answer is ready: That it will be those who have to work for their daily support, then when consumption ceases from lack of ability of the people to buy, mines will have to close and factories shut down, turning out their employees without other means of support, then will the true test of endurance between our own people and these foreigners come, with all the advantage on the part of the latter; because they can live on less, and will work for less than our laborers can and support themselves and families according to American standards. That these evil days are not far distant we must not deceive ourselves. Russell Sage and John D. Rockefeller are each credited with having said months ago that the present prosperity could not last more than two years longer, while Henry Clews & Co., in their weekly financial review of the 10th instant, in summing up the trade condition of the country, used these words:

> The fact that we are at the top of a big boom is universally recognized; and the moment that it is perceived that the unexpected turn has been reached, we are likely to see a very decided abatement in new projects, with a consequent slackening of demand for crude material and labor.

Mr. Chairman, I have already said that in 1883 we closed our doors against the Chinese, whose total immigration up to that time only amounted to 288,398, and they had been thirty-one years getting here. This was done chiefly because they threatened to injure the opportunities of our laborers. If such action was necessary then, how much greater is the present demand to weed out the tremendous flow of immigrants from all the rest of the world, which last year reached 1,026,499? At least one-half of these are of that class which offers an equal if not far greater objection than those alleged against the Chinaman. Does not the law of self-defense demand that we effectively deny admission to the unworthy, diseased, and dangerous who are daily supplanting American labor in mines, factories, and workshops, furnishing an unnatural proportion of the inmates of our asylums and other charitable institutions, as well as prisoners in our jails and penitentiaries, and those who sell themselves into slavery, in violation of existing law?

Last, but not least, those who stealthfully teach the lessons of anarchy and plot against all forms of government. Does not the voice of both duty and danger urge us to action, to purge our household of this lurking disease which threatens us from within, and to place additional guards at our gateways of entrance to see that none are permitted to pass who will harm our social, political, or economic well-being?

Let the watchword be "America for Americans," and those only who come imbued with the spirit of patriotism, love, and admiration for our institutions and the opportunities which our country affords to the worthy, frugal, and industrious to live and enjoy the full measure of freedom and independence which our Constitution guarantees to everyone who takes shelter under our flag. [Loud applause.]

Mr. HULL. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. POWERS. Mr. Chairman, I had the good fortune to listen to a part of the able and eloquent address of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], and so far as I could understand and comprehend his remarks he was severely arraigning the Dingley tariff, the principles of protection, and those of us who believe that under existing conditions in this country it is wiser and better not to disturb them by any tariff agitation or legislation at this session of Congress.

I beg to dissent from the views that he advocated. I presume I am one of those to whom he refers as a "stand-patter." I believe, however plausible in theory free trade may be, that for this country of ours, with its diversified interests, with its vast resources, and its wonderful diversity of soil and climate, a protective tariff better promotes the prosperity and welfare of all. I am a believer, therefore, in the principle that to-day, with unrivaled prosperity everywhere, with labor constantly and remuneratively employed, with the wheels turning, the furnaces blazing everywhere throughout the land, with a prosperity such as was never known before everywhere, he would be a bold man indeed who would attempt to do aught that should change or imperil this present happy condition of things.

I admit that there are some schedules in the Dingley tariff that I would like to see changed, and I do concede that perhaps it may be advisable in some future time to revise some of those schedules; but I do claim—and I speak advisedly—that that tariff was framed by a man who, though he came from my State, understood more of tariffs than any man, in my judgment, that ever served upon the floor of this House. I refer to Nelson Dingley, who was the chairman of the committee that framed that bill and from whom it takes its name. I also claim that that tariff is framed along protective lines more perfectly than any that has ever been enacted by Congress; and we all know that under it we have experienced a wonderful and unprecedented prosperity. We have but to contrast the condition of our country to-day everywhere with the conditions under the Wilson bill, enacted by the party whom the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] represents; a tariff that was supposed to be framed upon revenue lines, with protection as an incident. I can recall the contrast very plainly. I know that in my State not a new mill was built, not a new loom was set up while we were living under it. Our lumbermen worked, if they got employment at all, for one-half the wages they are getting to-day. What did it cause throughout the country? It gave us labor out of employment. It gave us soup houses in our cities. It gave us Coxey's army marching upon Washington. It gave us prostrate business and bankruptcy everywhere.

Mr. SHEPPARD. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Did not this depression begin before the Wilson bill went into operation?

Mr. POWERS. When a person or a party has threatened to do a certain thing, and has the power to accomplish it, and you know they are determined to do it, the effect of the threatened evil is quite as strong and paralyzing as the reality, when you receive the blow and know the worst. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. SHEPPARD. I would like to ask the gentleman how the Wilson bill of 1894 could have produced the panic of 1893?

Mr. POWERS. Because the people of the United were afraid of what the Democratic party had threatened to do, and their fears were amply realized. That is the plain truth of the situation. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I want to know how long it was before the election of Cleveland that the statement of "Rum, Romanism, and rebellion" was made which defeated Mr. Blaine?

Mr. POWERS. My recollection is that that was almost at the close of the Blaine-Cleveland campaign, but I confess to the gentleman that I do not see what relevancy that statement has here.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. The point is that you all expected to win up until that time, and it was not the expectation of a Democratic victory that brought the panic.

Mr. HULL. That was not the election of 1892.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. That was eight years before.

Mr. HULL. It was in the election eight years before.

Mr. POWERS. Eight years. That is no very great mistake for one of our Democratic friends to make, and it does not surprise me any. It is as close as our Democratic brethren often get to the facts of history. I do not care to discuss the tariff any further. Neither do I wish to discuss the question of reciprocity with Canada nor any other country. I am opposed to all reciprocity that would allow the products of any other country to compete with the products of our own. I am not opposed to reciprocity for noncompetitive articles. I believe our own markets are the best markets in the world, and I believe that our own workmen, our own farmers, and our own manufacturers should have the monopoly in our markets.

Now, I believe also that it is perfectly proper during the sitting of this committee to discuss almost any topic, and for a few moments I wish to call attention to the bill which was brought in the other day, and refused consideration by a vote of somewhere near two to one, to give the President power to consolidate customs districts without limit and without regard to State lines, which being privileged the gentleman in charge threatens to call up again when it shall suit his convenience, and declines to enter into any arrangement by which we shall know the time and be prepared to meet it.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Before the gentleman leaves the topic of the tariff may I ask him a question?

Mr. POWERS. Yes.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is the gentleman in favor of any amendment whatever to the existing tariff law?

Mr. POWERS. I could, if I would, specify a number of schedules that I would like to see changed. Any tariff that can be passed, any revision that can be made, must necessarily be largely a compromise; all the history of tariff legislation shows that, and knowing that fact I would rather bear the few ills we now have than fly to others we know not of. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Is the gentleman in favor of removing the duty on hides?

Mr. POWERS. No, sir; I stand by the farmer on that. [Laughter.]

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. He doesn't know it. [Laughter.]

Mr. POWERS. He knows it in my district. The gentleman may learn that he does in his.

When the gentleman interrupted me I was about to refer to H. R. 7114, introduced by the Committee on Ways and Means by its chairman [Mr. PAYNE].

I have generally followed the lead of the distinguished gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], and have generally, if not always, voted for every measure that he has brought in here for consideration, but I object to this bill. I object to it for two reasons. First, I do not believe that this House should surrender its rights to legislate upon a subject of this kind, because it has done enough of that already. I do not believe in its abdicating its right to legislate in the interest of the people and transfer the same to some Department or Bureau. We resumed one of our rights the other day when we took back the right to grant registers to vessels, which we had surrendered. I do not believe it is good legislation to permit the Secretary of the Treasury, no matter how wise and able a gentleman he may be—for that is what this means; the President will not have the time to look at it—without any consultation or any hearing to disregard State lines and to blot out customs districts that have been established by act of Congress going back to the days of George Washington.

I think that whenever one of these districts should be blotted out, whenever a change should be made, the proper way is to bring in a bill, discuss it before the House on its merits, and if it is in the interests of economy, if it is right to do so, let the House pass the bill—let is keep its own functions and not delegate them to some executive officer. I am opposed to bureaucracy. I believe it is better that the people should govern themselves, even if they do not do it as well as some bureau might, and that the same rule should apply to this House of Representatives, which especially represents the people.

Again, I want to say gentlemen, that in my deliberate judgment this bill will not effect what its authors claim for it; that it will not decrease expenses and that it may do injury to trade and commerce.

Mr. BARTLETT. Will the gentleman allow me an interruption?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. I agree thoroughly with the gentleman in being opposed to bureaucracy; I am in accord with that sentiment, and I apprehend that the gentleman would be opposed to a bureau set up in the Agricultural Department to fix what sort of food we shall eat.

Mr. POWERS. I am afraid they might raise the standard so high that I couldn't get any of it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARTLETT. Then the gentleman ought to be opposed to it.

Mr. POWERS. Now, the authors of this bill point out fifty-one collection districts where the amount received is less than the amount paid out. I want to make this proposition, that whether the amount received is more or less than the amount paid out is not the true criterion to judge of the necessity of a port of entry or a custom-house. I make the statement advisedly, having had something to do with customs matters, and having been collector of customs under President Grant on the eastern frontier of Maine, and had charge of a great portion of that frontier. One of the duties that every customs officer on the frontier or coast has to perform is to prevent smuggling, and unless you have an officer at the small ports and other places where smuggling can be carried on, you will not collect duties at the large ones.

The whole frontier of our country, the whole seacoast of our country has to be policed to-day by customs officers and revenue cutters. Now, how many of these customs districts might be dispensed with I can not say. There is no evidence in the report of the committee and none before this House that any can be, and, so far as I know, the doing away with any of them would increase rather than decrease expense and discommode commerce.

The report of the committee accompanying this bill gives us a certain number of districts where receipts are less than the expenditures, but it does not go any further and show us what services are rendered by the officers stationed there. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] says that he believes that the one down at Brownsville—that is the one where the expenditures are so much larger than are the receipts—may be necessary. I have no doubt that it is necessary. As I understand it, Brownsville was one of the old ports of entry, and as I am informed to-day the several deputy collectors and inspectors who have charge of the frontier for hundreds of miles along the Rio Grande are paid at Brownsville. If they were paid at El Paso, then the receipts at Brownsville would probably exceed the expenditures. Every customs officer is a disbursing officer. These various officers are paid sometimes at one place and sometimes at another, depending on who has charge of that particular territory.

Now, I desire to make another point as to the cost of these various offices. The amount paid to the several collectors in these fifty-one districts is $43,982.25. That includes some half dozen that I think no one will question are absolutely necessary where the salaries are large. For instance, I refer to the one down at Brownsville. There the collector gets a salary of nearly $2,000, having charge of all this matter, and there are several others. There is one at Eureka, Cal. I know nothing about that, but there is quite a salary paid; and there is one at Newbern and Pamlico, N. C., and at Sandusky, Ohio, where I understand the officer has charge of a large part of Lake Erie, and has to have persons all along the shore. It is a large shipping point on that lake. One of the large salaries is that of the collector of Grand Haven, which, I am informed, is the shipping port of Grand Rapids, Mich. But let me say to you, if any one of these collectors are receiving a larger salary than is a fair compensation for services, then let gentlemen show the fact and bring in a bill and have it cut down. Of the fifty-one nonpaying collection districts which are enumerated in their report, in thirty-six of them salaries of less than $1,000 are paid to the collector.

The principal expense of these ports is not in the salaries of collectors, for, as I have stated, the salaries are $43,982.25 all told in these fifty-one districts, being some $900 to a district. If you send a special deputy there in case you abolish them and it is necessary to have some one there, they all get $3 a day or $4 a day, and you can see very easily how you would increase the expense from twelve to fifteen thousand dollars in maintaining this cordon or guard, unless the best interests of the revenue do not demand that anyone should be stationed there. Now, there are two in my own State, which I shall refer to in a moment. There is one in Kennebunk, Me., where the collector receives the enormous graft—and I believe I am using the words of the gentleman from New York—of $78.75. There is another in Saco, where there is considerable shipping. Saco and Biddeford are cities served by this office having 30,000 people, where the collector receives $298.55. It so happens that I met the collector of Portland yesterday, and I asked him about these two places, for they are some 20 and 30 miles from his district. He said:

> If you will take away the small salary we are paying there, we will have to send a deputy collector and it will cost much more.

I presume that is true of most of these small ports. One word more. The amount paid out at all these small ports is somewhere in the vicinity of $150,000. The collector has many duties to perform, and in some places is the only officer at the port. He is there to certify to vessels and give them their register and clearance papers, and do everything that is to be done; and wherever there is anything paid out at any one of these ports beyond the salary of the collector, it is paid then to a deputy collector or an inspector, and there can not be a deputy collector or an inspector at any port unless the Secretary of the Treasury, looking to the best interests of the Government, decides that he shall be there. And whether there shall be one there or not, or how many any collector shall have, is determined by the Secretary of the Treasury. He can cut the force down whenever he pleases, as I have known him to do, or he can enlarge it if it is necessary and he wishes to do so, at least that was the rule when I was a collector of customs. Therefore, as in the case of Brownsville, Tex., and as in the case of a number of others that I could cite where there is quite a large expenditure, that expenditure is in excess of the small sum that is paid to the collector, which in nearly all cases is less than that paid to an inspector who would have to be there, because the Secretary of the Treasury decides it is necessary for the best interests of the revenue that the men should be there.

Because we have given the right to consolidate internal-revenue districts, whether wisely or unwisely, it does not follow that we should extend that to customs districts, for I do not think that they are similar in many respects. Neither do I think that it is fair to compare the cost of collecting the internal revenue of the country with that of collecting the customs of the country.

Internal revenue is collected upon a very few articles and, of course, at no very great expense, and the customs upon very many articles, and in addition to that the entire costs of preventing smuggling and policing the frontier is charged up to the customs expense. Therefore it necessarily follows that the expense of one would naturally be greater than the other.

You will notice, if you will look at the statement in the Treasurer's report of the cost of collecting the revenue in the several customs districts, that he reports other costs amounting to $127,204.40. Now, there are what are called "special agents" of the Treasury Department connected with customs who travel all along the frontier, and they visit the collection districts and they report to the Secretary of the Treasury, and on their report the force is often cut down or raised. Under these circumstances I submit to any person here if there is not a safe remedy to-day for a large part of the expense attendant upon these small collectorships unless the expenses are necessary to protect the Government and prevent smuggling.

Mr. SPERRY. You were a collector of the port?

Mr. POWERS. I was collector of a customs district.

Mr. SPERRY. And you know these facts which you have reported here to be true?

Mr. POWERS. I know they were as stated when I was collector, and I think they are the same to-day.

Mr. SPERRY. You know that to be true?

Mr. POWERS. Yes, sir. These collectorships are established somewhat for the benefit of commerce and shipping.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield to the gentleman from Kentucky?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. I want some information and the gentleman from Maine seems to be entirely conversant with the details of this. Do these collectors at these little ports issue licenses to vessels in the coastwise trade?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. GILBERT of Kentucky. And do they give clearance papers?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly; and more than that they see the vessels are properly manned and proper food is there. They have a large number of duties to perform, which if you look at the RECORD of last Thursday you will find were enumerated. Now, I have no doubt but what you will find that in almost every one of these cases, except some few of earlier date which were established away back in the days of the Adamses and George Washington, that they have been established for the benefit of the merchants, as in the interior ports, or for the benefit of commerce and shipping, as in the cases along the coast.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Will the gentleman allow a question?

Mr. POWERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I supported the motion the other day to go into the Committee of the Whole House for the consideration of this bill with the understanding there is no power under the law now in the Secretary of the Treasury to abolish a certain port.

Mr. POWERS. That is so.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. And I had the impression that there were some ports that might be dispensed with, and probably it would be good policy to vest the discretion in the Secretary of the Treasury to dispense with the supernumerary or unnecessary ports. Now, does the gentleman contend that there is not a single port of entry that ought not to be dispensed with, or it is not profitable it be dispensed with? Is that his opinion?

Mr. POWERS. I will say this: I know not but there may be some such port, but I will say the report of the committee accompanying this bill points out no such port, and personally I know of none.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. One other suggestion——

Mr. POWERS. And if the committee will bring in a bill or designate ports, and assign a reason why it is not necessary to have a collector, though his salary is the meager one of that of the collector at Port Jefferson, N. Y.—$62.30—I will cheerfully vote to abolish it, or any other one.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. The gentleman from Maine, I presume, will agree with me in the belief that if this authority were conferred upon the Secretary of the Treasury no port that is of use to commerce or the country would be abolished or dispensed with.

Mr. POWERS. Well, I do not know that I should fully agree with the gentleman as to that point. I will say this to the gentleman, that I prefer, so far as the four customs districts in my Congressional district are concerned, to be able to be heard before the Congress if any of them are to be changed or abolished, for I believe every one is very strongly in the interest of the people of my district, necessary to prevent smuggling and to promote the interests of commerce and shipping.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Maine yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. POWERS. In a moment; and if this Congress shall find that any one of them is not for the best interest of the revenue, is not necessary in order to accommodate the mercantile and shipping interest of my district, I will cheerfully acquiesce in having it blotted out, but I do not care to delegate to any Secretary of the Treasury through all coming time the right between two days or without notice to blot out or transfer to Massachusetts, as this bill obliterates State lines, any of the four customs districts I have the honor to have in my Congressional district.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER]?

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I should like to answer the question of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CRUMPACKER]. In my district is a custom-house which from the point of view, perhaps—I do not say certainly—of the Treasury Department, is retained for sentimental reasons. Now, there is a good reason why I, for one, should prefer to present the question of its retention to this Congress rather than to the head of any Department. I call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the other day the Secretary of the Navy recommended the discontinuance of the appropriation for the maintenance of the old United States ship Constitution. So far as the head of that Department was concerned, no sentimental consideration for preserving a historical landmark had any weight, and therefore the people of Massachusetts, with one accord, presented their case to Congress through your Committee on Naval Affairs. I venture to say that this body will take a very different view from the Secretary of the Navy as to the advisability of retaining such a memorial, even if it be not profitable.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. Does the gentleman have any idea how many ports of entry may have been established and are maintained now for purely sentimental reasons?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that a single one is maintained for sentimental reasons. I know that fifty-one in the United States failed to pay expenses in the last fiscal year, and that altogether the cost of those fifty-one was some $156,000.

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] yield to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. GARDNER]?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. It is in the time of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS].

Mr. GARDNER of New Jersey. I wanted to ask the gentleman if he had observed that where the ports failed to pay the expenses that the greater the deficit the greater the amount of business done, and the more reason for them to exist?

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. I quite observed that. I will point out to the gentleman that the most offending port of the United States from the point of view of profit is the port of Brazos de Santiago, or Brownsville, which the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means tells us can not possibly be abolished. That port alone costs $40,000 to maintain. Another is Grand Haven, in Michigan, which for very good reasons can not be abolished. This costs $9,000. Next is the port of Astoria, in Oregon, which costs $14,000 to maintain and yet can not be abolished. Those three ports alone cost $63,000 out of the $156,000 expended for nonpaying ports, and yet no Secretary of the Treasury would think of abolishing them. The leader of the Democracy [Mr. WILLIAMS] said that in a conversation which he had with Mr. Assistant Secretary Reynolds over the telephone he was informed that there was no intention of abolishing any paying ports. I do not know, so far as New England is concerned, of a single one of the nonpaying ports that could with advantage to the commerce of the country be abolished, although I will admit that there possibly may be found some of the paying ports that could to advantage be consolidated with other ports. Yet we are told that there is no question of interference with paying ports.

Mr. POWERS. The gentleman from Massachusetts has anticipated me and presented this question where the principal cost comes in better than I could. I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact that, of the fifty-one nonpaying districts, in thirty-six of them the salaries of the collectors are less than $1,000, and in many a very small amount. Now, I presume these small salaries resulted from the fact that way back in the early days of the Republic, when we had not these notions about money we have to-day, salaries were made very small for collectors in those ports, and as they have not increased in business they have been kept there ever since. In the ports that have been established in later days you will find larger salaries. As I remarked, the report does not show a single place where it is not necessary to have some one to protect the revenue and to do the business of the country, and I repeat I shall cheerfully sustain and support and vote for any bill that blots out any port that it is not necessary for that purpose. An act of Congress alone established each of these ports and Congress alone has the power to abolish them now, and I believe it should retain it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Maine has expired.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman ten minutes more.

Mr. POWERS. I have, as I said, in my district four customs districts. One of them is in the nonpaying list, and I believe it is as essential as any one of the four.

The salary of the collector is $990.70. He has under him four inspectors. He has some 200 miles of coast line. He has twelve ports at which vessels are entered and cleared.

The gentleman from Massachusetts remarked that he believed that some of the paying ports could be consolidated better than some of the nonpaying ports. I agree with the gentleman from Massachusetts as to that. I have in my district of coast line and frontier between seven and eight hundred miles, and probably there are stationed along that line at least forty-five men. Within the district is the nonpaying port of Machias, just referred to.

I wrote to the collector of Machias and asked him something about what he had to do. There is no district, in my judgment, in Maine or in New England, where the services are paid so lightly for as in the Machias district, for it is generally the case that in those small ports where the expenses exceed the revenue you can not get very much salary for anybody connected with them. That is always so. So I asked him something about what he has done this last year. He said the number of vessels entered from foreign ports were 91, and cleared for foreign ports, 179. Vessels entered from domestic ports, 16; cleared for domestic ports, 82. Then he gives the number of permits—305—and he goes through a whole list of the various things, and he wrote me this letter, which I shall read a little from. He says:

> Some of my ports are only a few miles from Grand Manan, and a few hours' sail from British possessions, and hence we have to be on the alert to prevent smuggling, especially of wool and fish.

It is very necessary that a collector should be in Machias to attend to the shipping interests of these twelve ports.

With all these vessels and ports they have to look after and give clearance papers to, he gets, not the salary that you would have to pay a deputy collector, for they get from $3 to $4 a day, but he gets $990.70 a year, somewhere over $100 less than would be paid a deputy collector. Now, I submit, gentlemen, under these circumstances, if it is good legislation to take these various ports that have been established, many of them, since the days of Washington, that are necessary to protect the interest of the revenue, and that are necessary to have a collector somewhere on the spot, in order to facilitate our commerce; I submit if it is good legislation to place in the power of the Secretary for all time the privilege of blotting them out, of transferring them, of paying no regard to State lines or anything of that kind.

From the earliest foundation of the Republic down to the present time this establishment of ports for the collection of duties has always recognized the State line. It has been a little recognition of something of State sovereignty that has been let alone. Therefore, while I am willing to meet the question on the floor of this House at any time as to the necessity of any port in my district, and ready to vote, I think, as cheerfully as the gentleman from New York for doing away with any port not essential, if that port shall be designated and a bill brought in for that purpose upon a report showing the facts, I contend that this report does not show any such facts or give any good reason for so doing. I do not know of any that should be done away with. I presume there may be some; but I do protest against this House vacating its right to legislate and turning it over to a bureau, a Cabinet minister, or to anyone for all future time. An act of this kind will permit the Secretary of the Treasury, with the consent of the President, to blot out and obliterate or consolidate districts established by the legislation of a century. Therefore I voted against going into Committee of the Whole, though I may say in all frankness I preferred to discuss and settle the question then and there, but I was overruled by other gentlemen, and when the majority are against me I cheerfully submit.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine a question if he will yield to me.

Mr. POWERS. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Do you suppose there is the slightest possibility either of the present President or any future one we might have abolishing one of these nonpaying ports that it is necessary to retain in order to prevent smuggling? Do you think we would ever get such a Secretary of the Treasury or President as that?

Mr. POWERS. I will say to the gentleman from Missouri that while I have the greatest confidence in the President and all of the officers of the President and all the Secretaries and Cabinet ministers, yet people are human and we can not penetrate the future. It is not for to-day; it is for the future; and, therefore, without any showing of anything that we need done, I for one prefer that this House of Congress do not vacate its right, but maintain the right to pass upon this question itself.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Now, if you will permit me, that was exactly my own idea in the committee; but men who had served on the committee longer than I, and who had had more experience in this very same question, said that it was utterly impossible to accomplish this result that way; that if the committee, for instance, brought in a bill here abolishing one port in Maine that the whole Maine delegation in all probability would fight it; if there were one in Massachusetts, the entire Massachusetts delegation would fight it, and so all around, all over the country, they would "double team," to use a common expression in the country, or, as some people say, "logroll," and they would all get together and would beat any bill that the committee would bring in. So at last I gave my adherence to this bill; but I do not care that much about it one way or the other.

Mr. POWERS. I am sorry the gentleman gave his adherence. I think his views were right, and I wish he had held to them.

But in answer to the other proposition, that no legislation could be passed, I am not of those who believe that this Congress or this House of Representatives is so corrupt that it will be swayed from doing its duty, and doing it faithfully, by any representations from the delegation from Maine or the delegation from Massachusetts. I believe that this Congress in a matter of this kind, when it is presented to them, will do justice and do what is right fearlessly, and it is to them that I would appeal.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Some of the grave and reverend seigniors on that committee said that human nature is the same everywhere——

Mr. POWERS. Yes; that may be so. If you can not trust this House, how can you trust a single individual?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And each delegation fighting for its own right, or what it supposes to be its right, at least, that there would be enough of them get together to constitute a majority of the House and beat it. Now, it turns out that without specifying the districts, there was an overwhelming majority of the House against the bill or its consideration. I have no pride of opinion about it one way or the other.

Mr. POWERS. A great many Members of this House voted against this bill because they did not like the principle involved.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not like the principle involved any more than the gentleman from Maine does.

Mr. POWERS. I voted against it and will vote against any bill of that kind, surrendering the right of the Congress to legislate, as often as it is brought before the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. You are getting to be a pretty good States rights Democrat.

Mr. POWERS. I was born a Democrat, but I got out of the party as soon as I was old enough to know better. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If you were born a Democrat, you are likely to become one again.

Mr. POWERS. I thank the committee and yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield twenty minutes to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON].

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] has seen fit to make an argument at this time against the bill which was recently presented to the House by the Ways and Means Committee, providing for the consolidation, reorganization, and formation of the customs-collection districts of the United States, and his arguments appearing to me to be so untenable, I have concluded that it would not be unwise for me to offer a few observations in support of the measure.

The first mistake the gentleman makes is when he undertakes to argue the proposition from a Democratic standpoint. He says he was once a Democrat, but that he got out of the party at an early age, and then argues that it would be un-Democratic to give the President of the United States power to reorganize and reform the custom districts of the country so as to weed out all such districts as do not furnish revenue sufficient to maintain the operation of them. I have been a Democrat all my life, and I have never seen nor do I ever expect to see the moment when I had or will have the least desire to leave the grand old party of the people for a single second of time, and hence I believe I am in a little better attitude to argue this question from a Democratic standpoint than is the gentleman from Maine, who so willfully and maliciously deserted it. I am not a deserter. I stand by my colors at all times and places. [Applause.]

Mr. POWERS. I did not desert the Democratic party. It deserted me.

Mr. MACON. Your evidence of that fact is no doubt satisfactory to you, but it is not satisfactory to the members of the Democratic party, that you turned your back upon when you deserted the party. I therefore decline to accept your statement that the party deserted you, instead of you having deserted it. The Democratic party stands now where it has always stood, upon the great economic principle of administering the affairs of the Government in the best possible way at the least possible cost to the people. The Democratic party stood there when you were a member of it, and whenever it reaches the point that it is willing to willfully and maliciously desert that great principle, as you deserted it, I hope it will be blotted from the face of the earth. I thank God that the Democratic party has no higher ambition than that of doing right by every community and every individual, regardless of locality or conditions. [Applause.]

A few days ago, when the urgent deficiency bill was before the House, I offered an amendment to the provision making an appropriation for the collection of revenues through custom-houses, limiting the expenditure so that none of the funds so appropriated could be used for the maintenance of a custom-house where the expenditure exceeded the customs receipts. While I was speaking to the amendment the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, arose in his place and stated that if I would withdraw my amendment his committee would report a bill to the House to correct the evils that I complained of. To which I replied that if he would promise me that he would report such a bill promptly, I would withdraw my amendment. He agreed to do so, and I withdrew the amendment, and, according to his promise, he reported the bill; but, strange to say, when he asked the House to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of discussing it, a large majority of both Democrats and Republicans who voted upon the proposition said by their votes that they did not even want to consider the question of getting rid of a system that filched more than $100,000 from the purses of the toiling masses of this country without returning a single cent to take the place of what had been filched from them.

In the report of the committee accompanying the bill there appears a list of fifty-one ports at which customs expenses exceeded receipts for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1905, which said list I will incorporate in full in my remarks, in order that the people from one end of this country to the other may acquaint themselves with this governmental leech that has been insidiously sapping it of a portion of its lifeblood for many years:

Mr. Chairman, when I offered my amendment to the urgent deficiency bill I certainly thought it would have the entire Democratic membership of this body behind it, because it sought to abolish custom-houses where they were not needed and where it was shown by facts and figures that as much as $1,400 per annum was being paid out for the maintenance of a custom-house where not a single cent of customs duties was being received; the thought of maintaining anything that cost the people $1,400 per annum, without giving them a single penny in return therefor, was so repugnant to my sense of right and so contrary to the principles of the Democratic party, as I have always known them, that I could not help but think that Democrats would support a proposition to correct the wrong.

But, sir, to my great surprise and utter chagrin, when the bill correcting the wrong was presented to the House and the simple request made by the gentleman from New York that the House go into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering whether or not this incubus should be removed from our body politic two Democrats voted against the proposition where one voted for it.

I confess candidly that I do not understand that kind of Democracy. It may be that my education along that line has been sadly neglected, but, whether educated upon the point or not, I defy anyone to show me a single plank in any Democratic platform ever adopted by a township, county, State or national convention that stood for a policy that sought to dissipate the revenues of the people of this country to the tune of $1,400 per annum where no consideration of any kind or character was given therefor.

The Democratic party cries out against the perpetration of such a wrong against the people's rights, and no man can logically justify the continuation of such an evil, and as an humble representative of my party I repudiate such a proceeding with all the force of my nature. [Applause.]

The gentleman of North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS], who represents the district in which Beaufort is situated, undertakes to defend the policy of maintaining a custom-house at that place at the expense of $1,400 per annum for nothing, and yet he offers no argument for its continuance except that at some time in the dim and distant past it furnished more revenue to the Government that was required to maintain it and that perhaps, if it is permitted to exist, it may at some indefinite time, in some vague way, again return to the point where it would pay a greater sum into the Treasury than it extracted therefrom for its maintenance. Such an argument would be silly were it not presented by so serious a gentleman.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] says that he does not know of a single one of the ports enumerated in the list embraced in the report of the Committee on Ways and Means that it is not necessary to maintain in order to prevent smuggling. I believe that in my benighted condition I can point out a port or two that I am sure it is not necessary to maintain in order to prevent smuggling.

Take the port of Vicksburg, Miss. (And I speak of Mississippi with the kindliest feeling possible, because that great State is close kin to Arkansas; we in Arkansas look upon Mississippians as brothers and sisters. A great many of them are now making their homes with us, and many of us sprung from a worthy Mississippi ancestry. But that is no reason, sir, that honest Democrats from Arkansas should not be against wrongs existing in Mississippi.) At that point a custom port is being maintained at an expense of $513.65 per annum, when it does not return a single cent in compensation or justification of such expenditure. Is it possible that the gentleman from Maine thinks that anybody could smuggle anything into Vicksburg? There are customs ports below that point on the coast line that would prevent such a thing.

Natchez, Miss., is in the same boat with Vicksburg. We pay out $500 per annum at that point for the maintenance of a customs port and do not receive a penny in return.

But, Mr. Chairman, before getting too far away from the port of Vicksburg I can not refrain from applauding the vote of the gentleman who represents the district in which that city is situated, the Hon. JOHN SHARP WILLIAMS, the illustrious minority leader of this body. He voted to consider the bill reforming the customs districts, and would vote to strike down an evil in his district as quickly as he would vote to strike one down in the most remote bounds of this Union. He is a Democrat of the pure type, and realizes that a man can not be a Democrat in the true sense and vote a Democratic vote upon one question and a Republican vote upon another. He knows that Democracy means Democracy everywhere and at all times, and that whenever you surrender any part of its teachings you surrender all, just as the Christian surrenders his Christianity when he violates any one of the Ten Commandments.

After having pointed the gentleman from Maine to Vicksburg and Natchez as being two points where no smuggling could be done, because of the ports upon the coast line, I will ask him to go a little higher up the Mississippi River with me, and let us turn up the Ohio until we reach Paducah, Ky. It is true that when this subject was before the house a few days ago the gentleman who so ably represents the First district of Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] undertook to show that there were several rivers at that point, and therefore the port was necessary. Why an interior port upon two rivers should be any more necessary than a port upon a great river like the Mississippi is something that I am too dull to understand. Paducah is more than a thousand miles from any border or coast line of the United States, and certainly nothing could be smuggled into that city.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] and the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS], who are unusually exercised over this proposition, attempt to frighten us from our position by referring to the port at Brownsville, Tex., where the cost of maintenance exceeds the revenues received; and they seem to fear that if this bill is enacted into law the Government will abolish that port. Why, Mr. Chairman, a President would be a simpleton of the worst character if he abolished a port like Brownsville, Tex. The Republic of Mexico, a foreign country, is just across the Rio Grande River from us, and at most seasons of the year that river can be forded, and were that port abolished smuggling from Mexico into the United States would be carried on the year round by the greasy inhabitants of that country.

Therefore it is absolutely necessary to maintain that port, and a President would be a fool to even give a thought to a discontinuance of it. Therefore the argument they offer, to the effect that if this bill becomes a law the President would abolish the port at Brownsville, is what I would call "tommy rot." I do not know just what that means, and in the absence of better information as to the meaning of the term I am going to assume that it is the cheapest kind of rot on earth. [Applause.]

If Beaufort, N. C., can show that it has a foreign territory just across a shallow river from the United States, where its citizens can ford the river and smuggle articles into this country the year round, the gentleman who represents that district need not fear that the port at that place will be abolished, any more than that the port at Brownsville, Tex., will be abolished.

Sir, gentlemen can not make such illogical argument as the gentleman from Maine and the gentleman from North Carolina have done in regard to this matter and expect sensible men to listen to it, much less believe it.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman point out on that list which, in his opinion, could with advantage be abolished, in order to give the gentleman representing the port an opportunity to testify before this meeting?

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I have just pointed out three ports that no one on earth who desires to do right by the American people could object to the abolishment of, and I think I can safely point out one in the district that the gentleman from Massachusetts represents, because a few minutes ago, in the time of the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS], he stated in effect that the necessity for the maintenance of the port in his district was founded upon sentiment; and I assert here that a sentiment that works to the injury of the whole people for the sole purpose of gratifying the sickly whim of a few in a given locality is as injurious to the proper conduct of the affairs of a great Government like ours as is foul air to the habitation of a cellar.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Apart from the one that I represent, and in time I shall endeavor to inform the House more fully upon that question, can the gentleman point out any other port on that list where a condition of things is shown that the port can be abolished with advantage?

Mr. MACON. Why, in my judgment, many of them could be consolidated with others, and in that way many of them abolished. I have just named several that could be abolished without regard to consolidation. It might be that the gentleman who represents Beaufort, N. C., might be able to save his much-beloved port at that place if the process of consolidation were to set in, for I notice, in glancing over the list of ports, that he has another port in his district that does not pay sufficient revenue to justify its maintenance.

It will not do to heed his argument, that if you allow the ports to remain as they are now that there may come a time in the unfathomable future when some vessel of some sort might bring enough railroad iron to Beaufort to in part compensate for having maintained it for so long a time when it paid no revenue. Gentleman, do you think that to be a wise policy to pursue? I do not, nor can I find anything but pure and unadulterated selfishness upon which it can be given a place to stand.

He says that at one time, in the long drawn-out history of Beaufort a vessel did land there and unload a lot of railroad iron, upon which there was sufficient revenue paid to maintain the port for several years. But, gentlemen, in view of the fact that this country is manufacturing railroad iron and sending it abroad and selling it for from five to eight dollars less per ton in the foreign markets of the world than it is sold to the people of this country, and in view of the further fact that it can be manufactured here and sold abroad at all, when it must compete in the open markets of foreign countries, can you justify a belief that another vessel will ever unload railroad iron at Beaufort, N. C., again? [Applause.]

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MACON. Yes, sir.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I understand the gentleman is referring in his remarks to the port of Beaufort, N. C., upon which I commented in my speech the other day. I want to ask the gentleman if he noticed in my speech that I showed by letters from Secretary Shaw that the receipts from duties upon imports into the harbor of Beaufort for three years amounted to $120,000 and the expenses of the port are $1,400.01 per year? Now, $120,000 duties upon imports would pay the expenses of the port of Beaufort from the foundation of the Government—from the time of George Washington down to the present time.

Mr. MACON. Oh, yes; I remember all that. It is in the RECORD. But because the port paid for three years of its existence is no reason why it should be eternally maintained when it is not paying.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Well, I want to impress it upon the committee——

Mr. MACON. The gentleman will have to excuse me for not allowing him to interrupt me further if it his purpose to make a speech in my time.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. I want to call the attention of the committee——

Mr. MACON. The gentleman has made his speech already, and it is in the RECORD, so anyone who cares to may read it. I therefore decline to yield to him to make it again in my time. I will say to the gentleman that there was a time no doubt when Beaufort was of some importance as a port, and possibly as a town, perhaps of more importance in every way than the city of Chicago was at that time; but he can not say that it occupies that position to-day.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Will the gentleman let me ask him another question?

Mr. MACON. Yes; I will yield for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that the port of Beaufort, N. C., has become the terminus practically of a through system of railway extending from the mountains of North Carolina to the seashore, and that the last river and harbor bill carried for that port an appropriation of $45,000 to deepen the water to make a depth of 24 feet at high tide——

Mr. MACON. Is that a question or a five-minute speech?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina (continuing). Up to the railroad wharves and piers?

Mr. MACON. I can not afford to yield for that kind of a question. It is too long. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Does the gentleman know it?

Mr. MACON. No; the gentleman does not know it, and in his opinion such a condition does not exist, unless it be a little two-by-four railroad that amounts to no more shan a side-show affair leading out from some insignificant railroad station to a tolerably fair town a few miles distant.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Now, I want to say further——

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I must decline to yield further to the gentleman who seeks to take my time in which to make his speech over again. [Laughter and applause.] Mr. Chairman, I will say, as a further response to the gentleman's long drawn-out question, that I was not aware that Beaufort was of such consequence as he undertakes to make us believe it is, and I do not think any other Member of this House believes it to be so important a place. In dealing with it in relation to the matter now under discussion we must deal with it by the amount it extracts each year from the Treasury and the returns it makes to it, which I have shown to be $1,400 to nothing against the port.

It might be, Mr. Chairman, if this bill becomes a law, that the President could re-form the various districts so as to preserve the gentleman's pet port—Beaufort—that he seems to desire to have maintained at all hazards and regardless of cost.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MACON. Ah, the gentleman from Massachusetts seems to have joined forces with the gentleman from North Carolina in his effort to maintain his port, which is founded upon sentiment, while the gentleman from North Carolina's port is founded upon nothing and has nothing but old age to support it; for, he says, it used to be one of the ports of colonial days. Perhaps, sir, it has sentiment connected with it, too, on account of its age.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield?

Mr. MACON. No, sir; I will not yield for the gentleman to make a speech.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Just a question.

Mr. MACON. Then begin. I can tell better after you have started whether it is to be a question or a speech.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Does the gentleman think $120,000 in three years is sentiment and not solid fact?

Mr. MACON. That is the same old question; you have asked that two or three times. But let us see how long it took for it to pay that amount.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Three years.

Mr. MACON. How many years has it been maintained in order to pay that amount?

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Well, that is enough to pay the expenses of the port since the days of George Washington.

Mr. MACON. Then you believe that because it was a paying institution for the period of three years under peculiar circumstances—circumstances that will not arise again in the nature of things within all time—it ought to be maintained at a loss to the Government forever? You might as well talk to me about working a coal mine forever that only paid for three years, and had to be worked for all time at a loss because it once paid to work it. There is just as much sense in working that kind of a mine as there is in maintaining a port that paid for three years and will never pay again.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. With the construction of the Panama Canal it will be one of the greatest ports on the South Atlantic coast.

Mr. MACON. Then, sir, when that day comes I will join forces with you to have your port reestablished.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. It is already a port of great importance.

Mr. MACON. Perhaps so, if viewed through abnormally selfish or greatly exaggerated glasses. No facts that you have shown or can show will justify your declaration as to its being of great importance. There is nothing in this bill nor in the history of the Presidents of the United States that justifies anyone in concluding that if the bill is passed ports will be abolished indiscriminately and without regard to their importance.

You gentlemen who are opposing this bill know that there is no necessity for maintaining the ports that you now attempt to defend. You know that the President, under his oath, will not abolish any port if given the power to do so, if the port, in the judgment of a sane man, is worthy of maintenance.

If you really and truly felt that the Government was justified in maintaining such ports as Beaufort, N. C., you would be no more afraid of the passage of this bill than you are of the zephyrs that press your brow each day.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Will the gentleman allow me there——

Mr. MACON. No, sir; your questions are too long, and they are the same thing over and over again. Hence I must decline to yield. To my Democratic colleagues I want to say that candor compels me to admit that one of the most humiliating moments that I remember to have experienced since I have been a member of this body was when the gentleman from New York, the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, delivered himself of the following language upon this question a few days ago:

> Now, I have picked out a few of these cases. I have noticed since I have been in Congress a good deal has been said on the other side of the House in favor of economy and reform. Economy has been the watchword always with the Democratic party—

And here he goes out of his way to make an exception that I do not think relevant and that I know is not true—> except when it is in power, and still I noticed almost a solid phalanx on the other side of the House coming up and voting against going into the Committee of the Whole on a bill that did what? Cut off possibly a few ports in the South where Republicans are holding down a comfortable salary for doing not a thing the whole year round. That is economy, I suppose. That is the highest standard of Democratic economy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I yield ten minutes more to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MACON. I thank you, sir.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. MACON. Not just now. Mr. Chairman, the idea of a majority of the Representatives of a party that has ever been so clean and upright, so vigilant, economic, and just in all of its acts pertaining to the maintenance and conduct of the affairs of this Government, having committed an act that justified a dyed-in-the-wool Republican in standing upon this floor and flinging into our very teeth the fact that the Democratic membership of this body had willfully violated the obligation of the party along the line of economy, is revolting to me; and the worst of it all is, gentlemen, he can turn a few pages back in the RECORD and prove it by a majority of the Democratic votes cast upon this question a few days ago. [Applause.] Great God! Has it come to that—that Democrats, chosen by the honest yeomanry of their party to represent them, can come to this House and so conduct themselves, so vote, that Republicans can flaunt into our faces that we have violated party faith and trampled upon the rights of those we represent? [Applause.] Has it come to that—that the Democratic representation upon this floor can be taunted with the fact of traveling the road of a wayfarer and have it proven by the record that they made only a few hours before? [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts rose.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Arkansas yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. MACON. Yes, sir; for a short question.

Mr. GARDNER of Massachusetts. Does the gentleman think it is fair to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, who is on his side of the question, to prejudice the minds of his colleagues against his support of the bill?

Mr. MACON. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] is amply able to take care of himself without the aid of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and I expect the gentleman from Arkansas will be able, in a sort of way, to maintain himself as he goes along without the aid of the gentleman. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MACON. I do not care to hear that old, old story any more. The House has heard it until it is tired of it, and I am just a little tired of it myself. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Explain how much economy this is.

Mr. MACON. The saving of the small sum of anywhere from $100,000 to $200,000, and it may be that in the wisdom of the President he will be able to find a way whereby he can save more.

Mr. Chairman, in his speech of a few moments ago the gentleman from Maine [Mr. POWERS] undertook to deliver a lecture upon the subject of State rights. Mighty Jehovah! [Loud laughter and applause.] The very thought of State sovereignty coming from his lips would be offensive if it was not so ridiculous. [Great laughter and applause.] Gentlemen, what have the States to do with this question? They have no more to do with it than I have to do with working the eternal hinges of heaven. [Great laughter and applause.]

The gentleman seemed to be bowed down under a great load of State sovereignty, but, judging by his close affiliation with a party that cares no more for State rights than I care about the seasons of a century ago, I am constrained to think that what he said was all a sham. He must have thought that he could deceive some State rights Democrat and induce him to come to his assistance in his opposition to the abolishment of unworthy ports.

It is enough to make an ordinary Democrat sick to hear State rights utterances fall from the lips of the gentleman from Maine. He did not tell us the names of the four ports in his district, and hence I am unable to tell from the list before me just what ports he is afraid will be abolished if this bill becomes a law. I can easily imagine, however, judging by the uneasy appearance of the gentleman, that all of them are unworthy of maintenance and ought to be abolished without delay.

Upon the same principle that "the guilty fleeth when no man pursueth," the gentleman protests against the abolishment of his ports when there is nothing in the bill that we are considering that says anything about abolishing them, but only provides for the abolishment of such ports as return no revenue to the Government and are not needed.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, that these gentlemen who protest so loudly against the passage of this bill know that in justice to the honest citizenship of this country their nonpaying ports will be abolished, and ought to be abolished, if this bill becomes a law.

The fact that the Government has long maintained a nuisance does not justify it in continuing it when it finds by facts and figures that it is such; and it is not the judgment of right-thinking people that an institution that once paid, but has ceased to do so should be continued forever because it did pay at some time in the past. We owe it to the American people to dispense with every nonpaying institution within the bounds of this Union, and if we mean to be honest with them we will do it.

We pledged our people at home that if they would send us here to represent them we would stand for economy, and we owe it to them to vote to carry out that pledge whenever an opportunity presents itself, like this one has, and we should embrace it with joy and gladness. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, in the short time allotted me, I can not hope to enter into the details of this important question, but I can, in an humble way, call the attention of the country to the fact that we have fifty-odd customs ports in this country that are being maintained at a great sacrifice, and then let it consider whether or not it wants such a policy continued. But knowing the integrity and wisdom of the people as I do, I am inclined to think that when their attention is called to this particular evil they will exact a pledge of their representatives to correct it or they will retire them to the shades of private life.

The CONGRESSIONAL RECORD goes to every community, and by searching it it can easily be discovered what Members of this body are in favor of upholding this unjust charge upon the people.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine, in his speech, indicated that something terrible would come of allowing the President to reorganize and re-form the customs districts of the country. I thought he had more faith in the ability and integrity of his President than that. Why, sir, I am not even afraid of the President, and I do not believe there has been a President from the days of George Washington down to this good hour that has ever had so little sense, integrity, or patriotism as that he would deliberately enter upon the destruction of any privilege or necessary institution, no matter where located in this broad land.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. THOMAS], in his speech upon this question a few days since, stated that he opposed this bill because it placed too much power in the hands of the President; that he was opposed to the centralization of government. I confess that all he said upon that subject was lost upon me, for when I consider that our forefathers saw fit to place the selection of the judiciary of this country, that passes upon the liberty and the rights of all the people, in the hands of the President of the United States, and did not consider it too much centralization of power, I can not help but laugh at the gentleman's argument about placing too much power in the hands of the President when he is given this slight additional power.

Some of the opponents of the bill have said that they thought this matter ought to be left with Congress, to which I answer that Congress seems to have made such a bad job of its management of it in the past that I, for one, am not willing to trust it to deal with it in the future.

Whenever any branch of this Government refuses or fails to discharge efficiently and honestly the duty laid upon it by the Constitution and laws of this country, I am in favor of taking from it the further right of dealing with the abused or neglected question.

Mr. POWERS. If the gentleman will allow me, I understood him to say that there would be a saving by the abolition of these customs districts of some $150,000.

Mr. MACON. I said anywhere from $100,000 to $200,000, and that I hoped that the President would be able, in reorganizing and re-forming the districts, to find a way of saving even more than that.

Mr. POWERS. The entire salaries of every one of the collectors, good and bad, those that should be retained and those which should not, if any such could be found, is $43,928.

Mr. MACON. I am surprised that the gentleman should undertake to tell us that $43,928 would virtually be all the saving that could be had by the abolishment of all the custom-houses, good or bad, in the face of the fact that the list that I referred to, as showing the fifty-one custom-houses that did not pay, shows that the expenses of maintaining them are $156,185.67, and that the revenues received from them only amount to $47,292.94.

Mr. POWERS. Every other officer is subject to be removed now, just as the law is.

Mr. MACON. That may be so; but has the gentleman from Maine seen any of them removed under existing law? [Laughter.] Under this bill several districts could be combined, and in that way there is no telling how much could be saved; but it is reasonable to assume that much good would come of the passage of the act, and we owe it to our constituents to do all the good we can for them, whether it be little or much.

In conclusion, I appeal to you gentlemen who stand upon the Democratic platform, that proclaims so loudly against the profligate waste of the people's money, to do what you can to correct the wrong you perpetrated against them the other day when you voted against going into the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of considering this bill. [Applause.]

While I know I am not the keeper of your conscience or your politics, still my great desire to have every wrong committed against the people righted and to see Democrats cast Democratic votes has impelled me to attempt to show you this matter as I see it. I am sure many of you did not fully understand the question when you voted "no." Gentlemen who seem to be greatly burdened with a desire to defeat the measure started runners out to tell gentlemen as they came in from their committee rooms to vote "no," and the idea soon prevailed on this side of the House that the question had been made a party one, and that we were to vote "no."

We have voted against the propositions of the gentleman from New York so regularly and unanimously since we have been here that I can easily understand how you, without being informed, could arrive at the conclusion that you ought to vote "no" when he voted "aye." [Applause.]

Ah, gentlemen of the Democratic faith, "be not like Esau, who sold his birthright for a single meal of meat," and sell one of the cardinal principles of your party for an unprofitable customs port for your Congressional district, "for you know that afterwards, when he would have inherited the blessing, he was rejected, for he found no place of repentance though he sought it carefully with tears." [Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. HULL. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH].

Mr. SAMUEL W. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to be heard at this time regarding the pending bill, but I do desire to submit some brief remarks regarding the subject of railway mail pay.

We all like to feel and know that we stand for the economical administration of governmental affairs.

Quite often economy is sought to be practiced in the reduction of the pay of some Government clerk or teacher who can illy afford to have their salary reduced, rather than apply the remedy in cases like this.

There has been no reduction in railway mail pay since 1878, but there has been a marked reduction in freight and passenger rates, and the receipts of the railroads are largely in advance, both in passenger and freight earnings, as compared to what they were when railway mail pay was last reduced.

It is to be regretted that the correct solution of this matter can not be arrived at with greater precision, but it does seem to me that a reduction of 10 per cent would be no more than fair and just and that the railroads ought to have no cause for complaint.

I hope, after a most thorough and careful consideration of this whole subject, that the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads will be able to arrive at a unanimous decision recommending a reduction of at least 10 per cent in railway mail pay, and I believe that no one thing will commend itself more to the people than this action upon the part of the committee.

There is a general feeling that the railroads are being overpaid for carrying the mail, and much has been said and written upon this subject. To those who have manifested any interest in this matter there must be cause for feeling greatly encouraged, because the Washington Post has recently taken up this subject, and in several able and well-written articles has spoken in no uncertain manner as to what ought to be done in this connection. For this reason, and because of the widespread influence of this paper, I ask to insert in the RECORD as a part of my remarks several articles which have recently appeared from the pen of Ira E. Bennett.

PAY FOR IDLE CARS—MAIL-CARRYING RAILROADS GET ENORMOUS PROFITS—CLERKS' LIVES IMPERILED—USUALLY ARE KILLED IN ACCIDENTS OWING TO INFERIORITY OF VEHICLES—ON ONE ROAD IN MICHIGAN ONLY 100 MILES LONG THE GOVERNMENT PAYS 58 PER CENT OF THE EXPENSE OF OPERATION AS COMPENSATION FOR THE CARRYING OF LETTERS—SHALLENBERGER SPENT A YEAR IN MODIFYING VIEWS ON THE SUBJECT.

[By Ira E. Bennett.]

The little railroad running from Pontiac to Caseville, Mich., constitutes postal route 137064, 100 miles long. Two trains carry mail on this route, the daily weight of the mail being 926 pounds. The United States pays $8,262.17 a year for this service. The trains also carry passengers and express. The total cost of operating these two trains is $14,160 a year. The United States therefore pays 58 per cent of the cost of operation.

The subjoined statement of the actual expenses for wages and supplies for running the two trains in question was obtained from an authentic source:

Train 1-2, leaving Pontiac 8.15 a. m., returning at night:

WAGES.
1 conductor, per month	$75.00
1 brakeman, per month	50.00
1 baggageman, per month	50.00
1 engineer, per month	100.00
1 fireman, per month	50.00
		$325.00
SUPPLIES.
Fuel, per month	$250.00
Water, per month	15.00
Oil and waste, per month	15.00
Other supplies, per month	10.00
		290.00
Total wages and supplies, per month		615.00
Total for one year		7,380.00

NEW ADJUSTMENT NEXT YEAR.

Train 3-4, running at night, has the same expenses as train 1-2, less the wages of one brakeman. This train therefore costs $565 a month, or $6,780 a year, making the total cost of the two mail-carrying trains $14,160 a year. This is making no allowance for interest and taxes, but the proportionate cost of these items is very small, the total fixed charges for interest and taxes of the railroad and its entire equipment being only $37,784.

The last adjustment of mail pay in the section through which the railroad runs was made July 1, 1903. Next year there will be another weighing, and it is reasonable to expect a decided increase in the weight of daily mail carried over the route. The cost of operating the two trains, however, remains the same, so that the Post-Office Department may look forward to contributing much more than 58 per cent to the expense of operating these trains.

Counting the receipts from express as well as from mail on the two trains, the total is more than 85 per cent of the total operating expenses, leaving the passenger traffic almost clear profit so far as these two trains are concerned.

The foregoing specific comparison between the cost of operating mail-carrying trains and the compensation received from the Government gives added force to the recent statement of Second Assistant Postmaster-General Shallenberger before the House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. His attention was called to a statement he made in 1898 to a Senate committee to the effect that the rates allowed to the railroads for the carrying of mail were less than the rates allowed them by the express companies. He replied that when he made that remark he had been but a year in office, and that his views were now changed. This colloquy ensued:

HE MODIFIED HIS VIEWS.

"Mr. SNAPP. Do I understand, then, Mr. Shallenberger, that your opinion now is that the compensation to the railways for the transportation of the mails is not excessive?

"Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I can not say that it is excessive, but I can say that it is greater, in my judgment, than the pay received from express companies and for fast freight. In those particulars I have modified my views very considerably."

It required considerable time for Mr. Shallenberger to modify his views to conform to facts that are known of all men. A glance at the earnings of the railroads of the country from mail and express might have interested a less conservative man long ago. The Interstate Commerce Commission's report for 1904 shows that the earnings of the railroads were as follows for 1903:

From mail and mail cars	$41,709,396
From express	38,331,964
Excess of mail pay over express earnings	3,377,432

In 1902 the excess of mail pay over express earnings was $5,582,385.

Mr. Shallenberger proceeded to defend the present rate of mail pay on the ground of improved service. He laid stress upon the "competition between railroad companies in recent years" and the rivalry among them for favors from the Post-Office Department. That there is keen competition between the railroads for additional railway post-office cars is unquestioned, and the activity of the railroad representatives in securing these profitable concessions can not fail to have impressed the Post-Office Department. One law firm in Washington in particular is highly successful in securing satisfactory treatment for its clients. A member of this firm was formerly in the Post-Office Department, and the technical knowledge he acquired regarding this complicated subject has been very valuable to the Pennsylvania, New York Central, Burlington, and Southern systems.

SOUTHERN MOST FORTUNATE.

These railroads enjoy peculiarly pleasant relations with the Post-Office Department. The New York-Philadelphia route, on the Pennsylvania, and the New York-Buffalo route, on the New York Central, are the heaviest mail routes in the United States, and the Department takes pains to see that the service is not hampered for lack of railway post-office cars, which earn an annual average of $5,427 each for the railroads. The Burlington, too, is fortunate in holding the exclusive through mail-carrying privilege from Chicago to Omaha. The Southern, however, is most fortunate of all, as it is not only paid as much as other roads for the same service, but receives $80,947.50 a year as a subsidy.

Not only do the railroads receive excessive pay for railway post-office cars, some of which are built of such inferior stuff as to make the death or serious injury of postal clerks morally certain in case of accident, but they receive pay for cars that do not turn a wheel. At the end of the last fiscal year there were 1,015 railway post-office cars in use and 215 cars in reserve. Mr. Shallenberger and Mr. Grant, assistant General Superintendent of the Railway-Mail Service, told the committee that these reserve cars were required in order that a regular daily service might be maintained. Mr. Shallenberger made the unequivocal statement that these reserve cars were not paid for by the Post-Office Department. He also made the unequivocal statement that they were paid for. His last statement was correct.

The following extract from the committee hearings explains the manner in which idle cars are paid for by the Government:

"Mr. FINLEY. I observe on page 116 of the report of the general superintendent of the Railway-Mail Service that you had in operation how many cars on June 30, 1905?

IDLE CARS PAID FOR.

"Mr. GRANT. At the close of the fiscal year 1,015 cars in use and 215 in reserve.

"Mr. FINLEY. You do not pay for the reserve cars?

"Mr. SHALLENBERGER. They are included in what we call the 'line,' which is paid for under the law, the line requiring one car each way and one car, if necessary, in reserve.

"Mr. FINLEY. Then you do pay for the cars in reserve at the same rate as the cars in use?

"Mr. SHALLENBERGER. We pay nothing for the reserve cars; they are included in the line, which constitutes three cars, if necessary.

"Mr. FINLEY. There are 215 cars in reserve?

"Mr. SHALLENBERGER. You will understand that a line includes a car each way every day. The reserve car can only be used when one of the regular cars for some reason or other is out of service. Therefore, we are not paying for the reserve car, because it takes the place of a car out of service at that time. The full line constitutes a car each way every day. Three cars are necessary to equip a line.

"Mr. FINLEY. The smallest number in use?

"Mr. GRANT. Not necessarily. If the line is unusually short, one car may make the rounds; then we have a reserve car.

* * * * * * *

"Mr. SNAPP. What I am trying to get at is this: It appears that there are 1,015 cars in use, which at an average cost of $6,000, would represent a capital investment of something over $6,000,000; that there are 215 cars in reserve, which are not in use, at an actual cost of something like $1,500,000, for which the company receives no compensation?

"Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I would like to correct my former statement; they do receive compensation, the regular compensation that is provided for daily service without failure."

PAY FOR "ADEQUATE SERVICE."

Mr. Shallenberger practically admitted that the Post-Office Department has no authority of law for paying the railroads for cars that are held in reserve. He said the only authority was "that of securing an adequate and satisfactory service." Without reserve cars the service might fail for one day on any route through accident, and while the Government might save the compensation paid for these reserve cars, the service would not be performed. Hence the Department construed the law to mean that reserve cars should be required.

Ostensibly a reasonable construction in view of the necessity for uninterrupted service, the reserve-car abuse is conspicuous on certain railroads. More cars are held in reserve than are needed, according to reliable information. Short routes, which require only one car or two, almost invariably have a reserve car also, drawing full pay, and on heavy routes many reserve cars are drawing pay from the Government at a rate which practically pays their original cost every year.

Assistant General Superintendent Grant testified that postal cars were repaired, heated, lighted, etc., at a cost of about $1,200 a year; old cars are thereby virtually rebuilt at moderate cost, enabling them to draw more than $5,000 a year during their lifetime of fifteen or twenty years. The total earnings of a postal car represent an enormous profit, after making full allowance for repairs, maintenance, and hauling. The quality of the cars on most railroads, on the other hand, is notoriously bad. Senator TILLMAN recently secured the passage of a resolution calling upon the Postmaster-General for information as to the life of postal cars, the character of their construction, etc. He was induced to do this after reading of frequent railroad wrecks in which postal cars were smashed to kindling wood and postal clerks maimed and killed.

The General Superintendent of the Railway Mail Service asks for an appropriation of $100,000 to enable the Postmaster-General to pay $1,000 to the legal representatives of each postal clerk or substitute killed while on duty. The number of clerks killed during the last fiscal year was smaller than during the previous year, but the percentage of those seriously and slightly injured was greater. The mortality in 1903 and 1904 was the greatest in the history of the Service.

PROBLEM OF MAILS—BELIEF THAT RAILROADS GET TOO BIG COMPENSATION—REDUCTION IS SUGGESTED—GROWING FEELING IN CONGRESS FAVORS LOP-OFF OF 10 PER CENT—PERFECT SOLUTION IS IMPOSSIBLE BECAUSE EXACT COST OF TRANSPORTATION CAN NOT BE DETERMINED, THE INVESTIGATIONS OF VARIOUS COMMISSIONS HAVING PRODUCED LITTLE THAT IS TANGIBLE—MANY INEQUALITIES SHOWN, BUT REMEDY IS LACKING.

[By Ira E. Bennett.]

Does the United States pay to the railroads too much money for carrying the mails?

This is a question that opens up many complicated problems, upon which able and painstaking legislators and Government officials have bestowed much study, with varying conclusions or none at all. The public conviction is that the railroads are getting too much for their service, and in Congress the feeling is growing stronger that a horizontal reduction of 5 or 10 per cent might be advisable.

If it were possible to ascertain the cost to the railroads of carrying the mails, the question of reasonable compensation could be solved with comparative ease. Or, if it were possible to ascertain the relation between the receipts in postage upon various classes of mail and the cost of transporting each class, a scheme might be evolved for paying the railroads varying rates for different classes of mail. But apparently the best experts, both on the Government and the railroad side, are unable to obtain these basic facts.

That the present system of railway mail pay and postal car pay is unsatisfactory, inequitable, and unscientific is generally admitted. It is the outgrowth of expedients adopted from time to time in the early days of railroading in an effort to meet changing conditions and to cope with the enormous growth of the service. The introduction of railway postal cars greatly complicated the task of ascertaining the cost of transporting mail, and brought about certain extravagances which seem to be increasing the Government expenditure without adequate returns.

BASIS OF MAIL PAY.

The United States mails are transported on the railroads without regard to the class of the mail, as a rule. Letters, newspapers, printed matter, and merchandise are dumped together and carried at the same rate of speed. The basis of pay is the "ton-mile"—that is, the railroads are presumed to be paid so much a ton a mile a year, whether the mail consists of letters, printed matter, merchandise, or all classes together. The weight of the mail is ascertained—or, rather, guessed at—by estimating the total weight for four years upon the weights ascertained by ninety days' actual weighing on each route.

Charges of "stuffing" the mails during the weighing period have been made frequently against various railroads. The wholesale shipment of bags of franked matter containing the speeches of Congressmen and kindred valuable information, in order that it might be counted as part of the regular daily mail, has been alleged. It has also been alleged that great quantities of bogus mail have been shifted about upon different routes, so that it would pass over the weighers' scales and swell the estimates for the four-year period.

"The opportunity and temptation to fraudulently increase the weights are almost irresistible," said Senator William E. Chandler, in his report on railway mail pay, in 1901, "because every dollar thus dishonestly secured by stuffed mails for one month is with absolute certainty a gain to the railroad company of $48."

The railroad companies themselves protest against the quadrennial weighing system, on the ground that it makes no allowance for the normal increase in the volume of mail consequent upon the growth of the country. They argue that while, perhaps, they may receive a fair compensation at the beginning of the four-year period, before it has expired they find themselves carrying great quantities of mail for nothing. It is even covertly suggested by some railroad men that stuffing of the mails is permissible, in order to equalize the pay to meet the increase during the succeeding four years.

RATES OF PAY.

The railroads receive pay in three forms for the transportation of the mails: First, compensation for the transportation of the mail itself, on the basis of weight; second, compensation for the postal-car service, and, third, direct appropriations for "special facilities."

The law fixing the rate for mail transportation was enacted in 1873, and amended in 1876 and 1878. The law of 1876 made a horizontal reduction of 10 per cent, and that of 1878 made another reduction of 5 per cent. Since 1878 no reduction in rates has been made, although the railroad rates for transporting freight and passengers have been reduced materially and great economies have been introduced in the cost of transportation.

The rate of pay for transporting mail under the law of 1873 ranged from $50 a mile a year for 200 pounds daily to $200 a mile a year for 5,000 pounds daily, and $25 for every 2,000 pounds daily weight above 5,000 pounds. The reductions of 10 and 5 per cent by the acts of 1876 and 1878, aggregating 14½ per cent reduction from the rates of 1873, fixed the rate for 200 pounds a mile a year at $42.75, with corresponding reductions in intermediate weights up to 5,000 pounds, the rate for which was fixed at $171. For every 2,000 pounds weight above 5,000 pounds the rate became $21.37 a mile a year. These rates are now in effect. A railroad carrying 100,000 pounds receives exactly as much as it received in 1879 for carrying the same volume of mail.

POSTAL-CAR SYSTEM.

The most important improvement ever made in the postal service, probably, was the introduction of the traveling post-office. This enabled the mails to keep pace with the passenger, wherever received and wherever delivered. The system began in a small way, but its adaptability to the needs of the American people caused it to expand rapidly, and railway post-office cars are steadily performing more mail distribution.

When mail is carried in an ordinary baggage or compartment car the railroad does not receive compensation for the car or any part of it occupied by the mails. Its pay is based solely on the average weight of the mail carried daily the whole length of the route. But when a full railway post-office car is added to the train, the Post-Office Department pays to the railroad a rental for the entire car, based upon its length. The mails carried in these cars are paid for, in addition, by weight. A car 40 feet long earns $25 a mile a year, a 45-foot car earns $30, a 50-foot car earns $40, and a 55-foot or 60-foot car earns $50 a mile a year.

The railway post-office cars used on most of the large railroad routes are 60 feet long, and weigh about 100,000 pounds. They cost about $5,500 each, and are built by the railroad companies according to specifications approved by the Post-Office Department. The Department requires the railroads to fit these cars with every convenience for the sorting of the mails, including lights, heating, water, etc., and they must be placed in position for use from two to seven hours before the departure of the train to which they are attached. Although capable of carrying from 20 to 30 tons of mail, these cars, as a rule, carry from 3 to 6 tons, on account of the space required for sorting. On dense mail routes storage cars are hauled, in addition to the railway post-office cars, and the railroads receive no direct pay for these storage cars. They are placed on the same footing as baggage or compartment cars, and the railroad receives its pay on the basis of weight of mail transported in them.

A railway post-office car travels on an average of 100,000 miles a year. It earns, therefore, about its own cost every year. This fact has served frequently as the basis of the erroneous charge that the Post-Office Department paid the railroads in full every year for postal cars without obtaining ownership of them. The important factor of hauling and maintenance were overlooked. Some railroad men estimate that the average cost of maintaining a postal car is $2,000 a year. The cost of hauling the car is difficult to ascertain.

The most searching analysis of the cost of hauling postal cars was made by Prof. Henry C. Adams, for the Congressional Commission, in 1901. He took the most dense mail route in the country—that between New York and Philadelphia, on the Pennsylvania Railroad. The railroad at that time carried an average daily weight of 309,000 pounds of mail a mile of line, or about 150 tons a mile a day. It was paid an annual compensation of $3,422 a mile, or $93.75 a mile a day. The mail was carried on 140 trains daily, although 90 per cent of it was carried on 26 trains. Taking the average cost a train mile at $1, although it is actually much less, and calculating that 2 tons of mail would be carried to the car, Professor Adams reached the conclusion that the cost of the mail service would be $3,796 a mile a year. This is more than was received from the Post-Office Department.

But if 3½ tons were carried in the postal cars the cost would be decreased to $2,244 a mile a year, affording the Pennsylvania a handsome profit for carrying the mails. And if the Post-Office Department should load 5 tons into a car the railroad could carry it at a cost of only $1,766 a mile a year, or less than half the sum actually paid by the Government.

This calculation was made on the estimated cost of running a train at $1 a mile, taking into account all operating expenses. The actual cost, however, is much less, according to the Interstate Commerce Commission. The New York Central estimates the cost of its passenger trains at 71 cents a mile, and mail trains are classed as passenger trains on account of the speed and other requirements.

If the actual cost a train mile could be ascertained, and if the postal cars were loaded more heavily, it is demonstrable that the Government could make a great reduction in the rates of pay to railroads, at least upon the denser mail routes. Economy in loading appears to be an important factor in readjusting rates to a reasonable figure.

RAILROAD SUBSIDIES.

The third form in which the railroads receive pay from the Government for carrying the mails is that of a direct appropriation for "special facilities." This is nothing but a subsidy paid by Congress to certain railroads, and there is apparently no reason why all other railroads in the country should not be granted the same concession. These items are:

Southern Railway: Washington to Danville, Va., 238 miles, $29,777.50 a year; Danville to Charlotte, N. C., 142 miles, $17,750 a year; Charlotte to Atlanta, 267 miles, $33,420 a year.

Western Railway of Alabama: Atlanta to Montgomery, 172 miles, $21,451.25.

Louisville and Nashville: Montgomery to New Orleans, 318 miles, $39,776.25.

Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe: Kansas City to Newton, Kans., 201 miles, $25,000.

This is a total of $167,175 expended for "special facilities," the money going to four railroads. The attitude of Postmaster-General Cortelyou toward this method of improving the postal service may be understood from the fact that he has omitted the items altogether from his estimates of appropriations for the next fiscal year. It is well understood that the Post-Office Department has authority to improve the facilities on any railroad mail route whenever the public interest demands it, and while the railroads might refuse to comply with the Department's request, they have not done so, but, on the other hand, are invariably prompt in installing improvements. Doubtless the Postmaster-General has omitted the estimate for $167,175 for "special facilities" because he is certain that he can secure these facilities without giving the railroad companies a subsidy.

The subsidy to the Southern Railway and the other southern roads is paid to maintain two fast mail trains southward, by which a business day is saved between New York and New Orleans. The argument is made that these fast trains would not be operated without assistance from the Government. Meanwhile the running time of trains is being reduced in all other parts of the country, and the mails secure the benefit without subsidy. The time between New York and San Francisco has been cut down twenty-four hours, so that mail between those cities is carried in three and a half days. A new fast mail from St. Louis to the Southwest has recently been established without extra expense to the Post-Office Department.

The active competition between the railroads of the country is revealed in the eagerness with which mail contracts are sought. The policy of the Department is to give all through mails to the railroad making the best time, ignoring all pleas for an "equitable division." The prestige of being a fast mail route is a valuable advertisement to a railroad, aside from the profit in carrying the mails. The Post-Office Department, being unable to change the rates fixed by law, does the best it can by exacting faster time and better connections by the railroads, thereby securing what is in effect a reduction of rates. All this is done without the payment of subsidies, except in the cases mentioned. In some cases trains are run consisting entirely of mail cars. Wherever competition exists the Post-Office Department seems to be able to obtain entirely satisfactory service without the use of subsidies.

COST OF THE SERVICE.

The total number of railroad mail routes is 3,064, and the total length of these routes is 200,965 miles. The annual travel on these routes is 362,645,731 miles. The annual rate of expenditure for mail transportation by rail—not counting the rental of postal cars—was $41,504,345 on July 1 last. The estimated expenditure for the next fiscal year is $43,253,000, being 5.75 per cent more than the appropriation for the current fiscal year, which was $40,900,000.

The total number of postal-car routes is 294, the total length of these routes 53,000 miles, and the appropriation for the current fiscal year was $5,875,000. The estimated expense of this service for the next fiscal year is $6,021,000, an increase of 2.48 per cent.

The combined expenditure for railroad mail transportation and railroad postal cars was $44,695,610 in 1904, an increase of 6.70 per cent more than the preceding year. The combined expenditure in 1905 was $45,576,515, an increase of 1.97 per cent. The increased expenditure for postal-car service alone, however, was 4.08 per cent more than 1904.

It is estimated that the railway postal clerks during the fiscal year 1905 handled 18,000,000,000 pieces of mail matter, exclusive of registered matter, of which 9,050,000,000 pieces were first-class matter, and the balance pieces of other classes. Of the second-class matter, 618,000,000 pounds were handled during the year, an increase of nearly 50,000,000 pounds.

The deficit of the Post-Office Department for 1905 was $14,572,584.13.

CAUSES OF THE DEFICIT.

It is the opinion of Chairman OVERSTREET, of the House Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, that a moderate reduction of the railway mail and postal car pay and a proper reclassification of mail matter would wipe out the postal deficit and enable the Post-Office Department to be self-sustaining. The necessity of overhauling the law relating to mail classification is apparent. Great abuses exist in the transportation of second-class matter, and the extravagance in the use of the franking privilege and other "Government free" matter is notorious. Mr. OVERSTREET is considering the advisability of restricting the franking privilege by permitting Members of Congress to send franked matter only within the boundaries of their districts.

Postmaster-General Cortelyou speaks frankly of the extravagance in sending "Government free" matter through the mails. He refers to the "weigh" of all mails in 1899, which affords a basis for calculating the percentage of free matter carried, and adds:

"It appears from this report that 'Government free' matter, exclusive of equipment, constituted 12.58 per cent of the entire weight carried, and applying this ratio to the revenue ($137,747,020.03) from matter mailed by the public during 1904—which, according to that report, is 87.42 per cent of the entire weight carried—the franking and penalty envelope privileges are found to have occasioned, in round numbers, an estimated loss in revenue of $19,822,000."

It is not expected, of course, that there will be an abolition of the franking and penalty envelope privileges, but a reasonable curtailment of the extravagance now rampant would unquestionably result in a comparative increase in revenue. Mr. Cortelyou suggests that each Government Department should pay postage upon mail matter according to its class, thus making each Department responsible for the entire expense of conducting its business, instead of throwing the burden of free mail transportation upon the Post-Office Department.

Second-class mail matter approximates in weight two-thirds of the bulk of all mail matter, according to estimates which are accepted as correct by the Postmaster-General. It pays, however, only 4 per cent of the postage revenue. Second-class matter pays 1 cent a pound, while the estimated cost of transporting all mail matter, according to Mr. Cortelyou, is from 5 to 8 cents a pound. This estimate, it must be conceded, is almost guesswork, but postal experts generally believe that it is near the truth. The actual revenue from second-class matter last year was $6,186,647, while the cost of transporting it, at the estimate of 5 cents a pound, was $33,155,356.

The Postmaster-General points out that the elimination of matter from the second class that does not belong there is a tedious process, but that progress is being made. The postmasters at New York and Chicago have eliminated 4,000,000 pounds annually of books which had been improperly placed in the second class. Other matter to the amount of 16,000,000 pounds has been eliminated from the second class. Legislation, however, is required to correct the great abuses that remain, and Mr. Cortelyou recommends a thorough review of the whole subject by Congress.

INVESTIGATIONS BY CONGRESS.

Congress has endeavored through at least three commissions to gather accurate information on all phases of the subject, in order to ascertain whether or not excessive prices are paid to the railroads for mail transportation and for postal-car service. Volumes of testimony have been printed. In 1876 a commission recommended that the Postmaster-General be authorized to determine the amount of space required for the transportation of mails by railroad, proportionate to the quantity of mail carried. No action was taken on this recommendation. In 1883 a commission recommended that the compensation to railroads be fixed upon the basis of space used, modified by the weight and frequency of the mails. This recommendation was ignored by Congress.

The most exhaustive investigation of the subject was made by the Congressional commission created in 1898, which reported in 1901. This commission consisted of Senators Wolcott, ALLISON, Chandler, and MARTIN, and Representatives Loud, Moody, Catchings, and Fleming. Testimony was taken in several parts of the country. The commission made seven reports, signed by one or more members. Senators Wolcott and ALLISON reported that, upon a careful consideration of all the evidence and in view of the services rendered by the railroads, they were of the opinion that the prices paid to the railroads for mail transportation were not excessive, and recommended that no reduction be made.

Senator MARTIN and Representative Loud concurred in this recommendation, with modifications. Representative Fleming recommended a reduction of 5 per cent from the existing rates of pay. Senator Chandler joined in Mr. Fleming's recommendation, with some reservations. Messrs. Moody and Catchings agreed that it was impossible to conclude upon the evidence presented that the rates of pay were excessive, and recommended that further investigation be made. The failure of the Commission to present a conclusive report resulted, of course, in a failure by Congress to reduce the rate.

AN EXPERT'S CONCLUSION.

The Commission, realizing early in its investigation that a multitude of intricate problems were presented, all bearing with more or less force upon the question of reasonableness of compensation, employed Henry C. Adams, professor of political economy and finance in the University of Michigan, as an expert investigator.

Professor Adams submitted a voluminous report, in which he analyzed, as far as possible, all the arguments presented to the Commission for and against, and discussed the fundamental principles relative to railway mail compensation. He recommended a horizontal reduction of 5 per cent from the existing rate of compensation on all railway routes and a progressive reduction of pay on all routes receiving in excess of 20 cents a ton a mile, running from 1 per cent in the case of routes receiving 20 cents a ton a mile up to 12 per cent in the case of routes receiving 7 to 7.34 cents a ton a mile.

This scheme of progressive reduction was based upon the theory that the dense routes ought to bear the burden of reduction in a greater degree than the sparse routes, because of the rule that decreased cost follows increased density of traffic. The estimated reduction of railway mail pay under Professor Adams's scheme was $3,000,000 a year.

Professor Adams made comparisons of rates received by railways for the transportation of mail, first-class freight, and express, and expressed the opinion, from the data cited, that "railway mail rates are higher than freight rates or express rates, and that this excess payment extends not only to the dense routes, but to all routes."

The conclusion of Professor Adams was as follows:

"Whether, then, the matter be looked at from the point of view of train-mileage or car-mileage cost, or from that of the comparative rate of pay received by railways from mail, from first-class freight, and from express; or from that of the ratio of the amount contributed by the Government to the gross earnings of railways to that contributed by other services, a reasonable reduction in railway mail pay is defensible."

A Post-Office Department report, made in 1900, quotes from Cowles's General Freight and Passenger Post the following:

"Our express companies carry all sorts of parcels, from the domicile in New York to the station, thence by rail a thousand miles to Chicago, and deliver at the domicile in that city, at the rate of $3 a hundred pounds, but the railways tax the Government $2.77 a hundred, $55.50 a ton, for the transportation of its mail bags for an average haul of not over 442 miles."

SENATOR CHANDLER'S VIEWS.

Senator Chandler in his views as a member of the Railway Mail Pay Commission, reached the conclusion that it was impossible with the facts at hand to demonstrate whether the compensation to the railroads for carrying the mails was just or otherwise. He mentions some of the difficulties in the way of arriving at an absolute demonstration of what is just compensation, and concludes:

"Does it follow, therefore, that the Government must go on for an indefinite period to pay the present rates for transporting the mails? The undersigned does not so conclude. The present rates per pound weights were first fixed in 1873, were reduced 10 per cent in 1876 and 5 per cent more in 1878. It is not proved that they were inadequate then, and it is not probable that it is unjust to require some reduction of rates when freight and passenger rates have been so largely reduced during the same period.

"Accuracy of compensation being impossible, the best judgment of all persons having to deal with the subject must be exercised.

"The Commission, as authorized by Congress, employed a highly competent expert (Prof. Henry C. Adams), and he recommended a reduction of 5 per cent of the compensation on all routes, and a further reduction varying from 1 per cent to 12 per cent on the railroad routes where the traffic is most dense, as being, in his judgment, below the percentage of reduction which could be justly demanded by reason of changed conditions. The undersigned joins with Representative Fleming in recommending the foregoing reductions and in the removal of the present limit of progressive reduction to 5,000 pounds, and also joins in Mr. Fleming's recommendation of $2,000 a year 'as ample special pay for railway post-office cars.'"

While the matter of railroad rate regulation is before Congress, it is possible that some attention will be paid to the question whether or not the greatest shipper in the country—the United States Government—is receiving a "square deal" from the railroads. In readjusting railway mail rates to meet the conditions that have developed since 1878, Congress is not hampered by questions of constitutional authority. Its authority to fix reasonable rates is unquestioned.

CUT MAIL TRAIN COST—EFFORT TO BE MADE TO KNOCK OFF 10 PER CENT—NO REDUCTION SINCE 1878—HOUSE MEMBERS LOOKING UP INFORMATION IN PREPARING AMENDMENT TO POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL FIND THAT ROADS CARRY MAIL ON SCHEDULES DIFFERENT FROM WHAT THEY MIGHT BE.

[By Ira E. Bennett.]

An effort will be made in the House of Representatives to secure the adoption of an amendment to the post-office appropriation bill, reducing the railway mail pay by 10 per cent. Members of Congress who intend to press the matter are now looking up precedents preparatory to framing an amendment that can not be ruled out of order as new legislation or matter not germane to the bill.

Skillfully worded amendments have been made to post-office appropriation bills heretofore which changed existing law or added new laws to the statute books, and if the temper of the House should be favorable it can be done again.

The House Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads has examined Second Assistant Postmaster-General Shallenberger on the question of railway mail pay, and while the hearings have not been made public, it is learned that Mr. Shallenberger has not only defended the present rate of pay, but has gone further, and recommended that the railroads be paid for the space used by the mails in apartment cars.

The railroads have never been paid for the space in apartment cars. When the amount of mail on any route becomes so large that additional facilities are needed, it is usually the rule to authorize the railroad company to put on "full railway post-office cars," for which the Government pays a rental. On some routes large quantities of mail are transported in apartment cars, the space occupied often amounting to 30 linear feet. The railroads are paid according to the weight of the mail, without regard to the space occupied.

Mr. Shallenberger's proposition was to allow the railroads 50 cents a linear foot for space in apartment cars and to reduce the rental of full railway post-office cars to 50 cents a linear foot. At present $25 a mile a year is paid for 40-foot postal cars, $30 for 45-foot cars, $40 for 50-foot cars, and $50 for 55 and 60 foot cars. At 50 cents a linear foot these rates would be reduced to $20 for 40-foot cars and $30 for 60-foot cars.

SAYS SAVINGS AND EXPENSES BALANCE.

It was argued by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General that the outlay on apartment cars would be roughly balanced by the saving on full postal cars. The object of the change, he said, was to equalize the pay to all railroads on the basis of space occupied, whether in apartment or full postal cars.

When Mr. Shallenberger was asked to produce figures showing the actual result of the proposed change, he was unable to furnish them.

Members of the committee made rough calculations which convinced them that such a change would result in increased pay to the railroads, and they were inclined to find fault with the suggestion for paying still more money to the railroads for transporting the mails.

There are 3,064 railway mail routes in the United States, with a total length of 200,965 miles. On only 294 of these routes are postal cars used, and the total length of routes covered by postal cars is 53,089 miles. During the last fiscal year full postal cars displaced apartment cars on 5,417 miles. On 2,770 routes, covering 147,876 miles, the mails are now carried with no charge for the space occupied, although constant improvement is being made in the service by installing postal clerks in apartment cars, where they perform the same service as full postal cars on heavier mail routes.

The proposal by the Second Assistant Postmaster-General was taken by the members of the committee to be a recommendation from the Post-Office Department, since Mr. Shallenberger has entire charge of the Railway Mail Service. The statement was made yesterday by a member of the committee that there might be a rumpus when it became known that an attempt was being made to pay the railroads more than they are now receiving from the Government. He thought the result would be an amendment reducing railway mail pay.

THINKS REDUCTION UNJUST.

In his annual report Mr. Shallenberger explains that, in his opinion, there can not justly be a reduction in railway mail pay. He admits that there has been no reduction in railway mail rate since 1878, but he insists that "there has been a radical change in the character and amount of service rendered by railway companies for the compensation paid them." He refers to the increased speed of trains, the allotment of space in railway stations for the use of mail transfer clerks, and adds:

"The growth of the postal business makes necessary a much greater number of special agents, inspectors, and traveling officials, all of whom must be given transportation by railroad companies without additional compensation." Mr. Shallenberger might have added that the free transportation of postal officials and clerks, their wives, children, aunts, cousins, and friends, is an old-established custom that explains, in part, the inability of postal officials to see any defects in the present system. Division superintendents of the Railway Mail Service have no trouble in obtaining transportation for their friends. Postal inspectors are cultivated by the railroads, and if there is any stuffing of the mails at weighing time the inspectors have not discovered it. The railroads did not include the families and friends of post-office officials in their anti-pass order of January 1.

Throughout the testimony of railroad officials before the Railway Mail Commission ran the note of insufficient pay. It was impossible for the Commission to ascertain the cost of transporting the mails. The railroad officials declared that it was impossible to furnish the figures of cost, but they had no hesitation in declaring that the compensation was below the cost, whatever it was. They raised questions of "dead freight" and "live freight," of the speed of trains, of the hauling of postal clerks free, of the trouble and expense of carrying mails from stations to post-offices, of the wear and tear upon roadbeds, of apartments furnished for nothing a year, and a thousand and one additional items bearing upon the cost of transporting the mails. The only inference to be drawn was that the mails were carried by the railroads at an enormous loss.

ONLY AS ADVERTISEMENTS.

Yet Mr. Shallenberger, in his annual report, speaks of competing lines between terminal points, "pleading" for an equitable division of through mail, as though the railroads were anxious to accommodate the Government, even at great financial sacrifice to themselves.

One of the great mail routes of the country is that between Chicago and Omaha, on the Burlington railroad. The officials of that company intimated that there was no profit in this business, and that they carried the mail only as an advertisement. The railroad runs three exclusive mail trains on this route, and the pay is 92 cents a train mile. As the Interstate Commerce Commission estimates that the average cost of operating a passenger train is 95 cents a mile, the public is left to infer that the Burlington is running its fast mail trains at a loss. The frantic rivalry between the Northwestern and the Burlington for this mail contract was explained on the ground of its great value as an advertisement.

Mr. Dixon H. Kennett, general traveling agent of the Missouri lines of the Burlington system, testified before the railway mail commission that he had charge of the mail on the Burlington route between Chicago and Omaha. He made this statement to the commission:

"The fast-mail trains earn, including pay for railway post-office cars, 92 cents per train mile. The six through passenger trains earn, for the same distance and over the same route, an average of $1.26 per train mile from passengers alone. The earnings of all passenger trains over the route, from passengers alone, $1.03 per train mile. The earnings of all freight trains, including 2,600 miles of main line and branches, were $1.49 per train mile."

Thus it appeared that the passenger and freight trains earned much more than the mail trains. It occurred, however, to members of the commission to ask how many cars made up these trains, and these facts were elicited from Mr. Kennett: Mail trains average 3½ cars, through passenger trains average 7½ cars, and freight trains average 25 cars.

So it was brought out that the Burlington received 26.29 cents a mile for hauling a mail car, 13.86 cents a mile for hauling a passenger car, and 5.96 cents a mile for hauling a freight car.

MAILS ARE PADDED—GOVERNMENT HAS NEVER BEEN ABLE TO PROVE STUFFING—SENT AT WEIGHING TIME—USE OF REPRESENTATIVE BARLOW'S OFFICIAL FRANKS IS RECALLED—RAILROADS ENRICHED AT THE EXPENSE OF UNITED STATES—PAPERS SENT OVER A SHORT NEVADA ROAD, BUT THE POSTAL CLERK'S REPORT NEVER REACHED WASHINGTON—SEEDS, CONGRESSIONAL RECORDS, AND CIRCULARS SENT BY MAIL.

[By Ira E. Bennett.]

It is rather remarkable that some railroads find fault with the system of weighing the mails, and at the same time fly to the defense of the system when it is pointed out that gross frauds may be committed against the Government and in favor of the railroads.

A recent defender of the railroads makes the unqualified statement that it is impossible to send wholesale shipments of franked matter through the mails at the weighing period, and that stuffing of the mails is not and can not be practiced without detection.

"The railroad companies," he says, "have literally nothing to say about the routing of the mails and nothing to do with the weighing, and therefore can not cause bogus mail to be twice weighed nor direct shipments of franked matter."

This is cunningly stated. Of course, the railroads have nothing to do with the routing of the mails. Nobody alleges that they have. Nor do they have anything to do with the weighing. Nor do they directly cause bogus matter to be "twice" weighed, nor do they in their own persons direct the shipments of franked matter.

But this does not mean that the mails can not be and are not stuffed. It is not a denial of the fact that bogus matter is introduced in the mails during the weighing period, and that this matter, once weighed, and sometimes twice weighed, is counted as part of the average daily mail passing over that route, and that the railroad carrier is paid accordingly. The railroad company may not have been the stuffer, but it is the beneficiary, and the United States is the loser. The railroad companies may not themselves, of course, "direct the shipments of franked matter," but the fact remains that large shipments of franked matter have been discovered during the weighing period, swelling the mails and adding to the compensation of the railroads.

The mails are weighed for a period of ninety days once in four years. There are four weighing districts in the United States, and the mails are weighed in one of these sections every year. The first section comprises New England, New York, Pennsylvania, Maryland, the District of Columbia, and the Virginias. The mails were weighed in this section last spring, and the mail pay readjusted on the basis of the new weights, beginning July 1, 1905.

The second section consists of the South, the third section of the Middle West, and the fourth section of the territory west of the Missouri River. Mails will be weighed in the fourth section during the coming spring.

DOOR OPEN TO FRAUD.

It was formerly charged that the railroad companies were secretly notified of the time selected by the Post-Office Department for the weighing of the mails, and that the railroads, or their friends, took advantage of this information to stuff the mails during the weighing period. At that time the weighing period was thirty days instead of ninety days as now. But it was pointed out by Mr. Loud, of the Postal Commission, that it was unnecessary that there should be corrupt advices from persons in the Post-Office Department as to the weighing period. In reply to a witness who alluded to an allegation that the railroads had been corruptly advised of the weighing period in a certain section and had taken advantage of the information, Mr. Loud said:

"Of course, there need be no corrupt advices in this matter, because the railroad companies, if they desire to pad the mails, could prepare themselves for the time, which always comes in the spring. The date is not set, nor need it be set, because it covers thirty days, and they would have an opportunity after the weighing actually begun to stuff the mails if they desired to do it."

There is nothing here as to the "impossibility" of stuffing the mails, but merely a statement that the way is open for fraud if the desire to commit it exists. As the padding of the mails is a misdemeanor, no one will be found who admits that he is guilty of it.

The "Barlow case" is often cited as an example of the manner in which the mails can be padded without identifying the persons guilty of the offense. Mr. Barlow was a Member of Congress from California. During the weighing period in the West a large number of sacks filled with documents bearing Barlow's frank were held up at New Orleans.

The matter had been sent from Washington and was destined for California points. If it had been weighed the Southern Pacific Company would have profited greatly through the increase of its pay based on the daily average for the four years succeeding.

Congressman Barlow was at first accused of stuffing the mails in the interest of the railroads, but it was soon found that he was innocent of any intentional wrongdoing. If he mailed the matter himself, which was not clearly shown, it was in ignorance of the fact that the weighing period had arrived. If agents or friends of the railroad obtained possession of Barlow's franks and dispatched the stuff, their identity was never disclosed. When the postal authorities at New Orleans called Mr. Barlow's attention to the accumulation of matter bearing his frank, and suggested that it be held up until the end of the weighing period, he promptly acquiesced.

SPECIFIC CASE OF STUFFING.

The Postal Commission, while taking testimony in California, unearthed a specific case of mail stuffing. The circumstances indicated to some extent, collusion on the part of the postal authorities, but the Commission did not investigate this feature to the end.

On February 23, 1898, the superintendent of the railway mail service, eighth division, issued a circular headed "Confidential instructions to railway postal clerks in connection with weighing of mails." This circular read in part as follows:

"It having developed during the recent weighings of the mails in other sections of the country that large quantities of newspapers which had up to the beginning of the weighing been forwarded by express were, during the weighing, forwarded by mail, and immediately afterwards dispatched by express, it is desired to ascertain, as far as possible, how much this is done in this division during the coming period of weighing." Then follow instructions to clerks, requiring them to keep record of daily-paper mail and to note any increase during the weighing period.

In due time a report, dated March 28, 1898, was received from J. M. Gray, a railway postal clerk in the Amadee and Reno Railway postal service, as follows:

"In response to your confidential instructions of February 23, 1898, I wish to state that I received at Reno, Nev., extra San Francisco Daily Calls, single wrappers, in the sacks, made up by San Francisco post-office for Vinton, Clairville, Beckwith, Mohawk, Johnsville, Quincy, and Crescent Mills, and extra San Francisco Daily Examiners, single wrappers, in Amadee and Reno tie sacks, for the same places on March 25, 26, and 28, 1898. On March 25 I received about 100 pounds extra, on March 26 about 200 pounds extra, and on March 28 about 600 pounds extra. All this extra mail is for the Cuba and Clairville Railroad."

The weighing began on March 22 and continued for six weeks. Mr. Gray reported, on the same form as the report just quoted, that extra newspaper mail had passed through his hands from March 29 to May 9, the daily extra weight running from 106 to 682 pounds. May 9 was the last day of the weighing, and the weighing period covered forty-nine days.

The Commission examined Henry A. Bowen, president and manager of the Sierra Valley Railway, sometimes called the Cuba and Clairville road. This road is 30 miles long. He testified that he had not secured the shipment of the extra newspaper mail in question over his railroad, and had not authorized any other person to do so. He had regarded his mail pay as inadequate, but declared that he had never done anything to pad the mails during weighing time.

The managers of the San Francisco Examiner and the San Francisco Call were examined. The manager of the Examiner testified that one of his circulation solicitors came to him and stated that he had a list, or could get a list, of names in towns along the railroad in question, and that "it would please Goldberg, Bowen & Co. to have them sent up." The Bowen of Goldberg, Bowen & Co. was the Bowen who owned and managed the railroad. The papers were sent accordingly, and the bill was charged to Goldberg, Bowen & Co. The manager of the Examiner testified:

"Somebody in the mail service happened to see me one day and told me that we had been sending a big lot of papers to that little road of Bowen's and that they were being used for the purpose of stuffing the mails on that road. When I spoke about it to the committee I supposed, of course, it was a matter with which you were thoroughly familiar."

ORDERED BY BOWEN.

The manager of the San Francisco Call gave testimony which definitely exposed the scheme of stuffing the mails. He testified that a large number of Calls were sent as sample copies over the Bowen railroad, and that they were ordered by Mr. Bowen himself. The exact statement was as follows:

"Q. Were they ordered by anybody?—A. They were ordered by Mr. Bowen, of Goldberg, Bowen & Co.

"Q. Mr. Bowen is the president and manager of the Sierra Valleys Railroad Company?—A. Yes; so he represented at the time.

"Q. He ordered those papers sent?—A. Well, he came in here and stated that if we would send a certain number of papers to the names of different parties along his road, he would have his agents act as our agents, and thereby increase our subscription list through that section. I asked him about how long he would require those papers, and he said probably a month or so. He said he would give instructions to his superintendent to have his agents look out for our interests, do some canvassing, and get a number of subscribers. It seemed to be a very plausible proposition, and he being a man of standing, I accepted the offer. He agreed to send the list of names, which he did, and it seems to me that there were between 300 and 400 names."

The papers were sent for five weeks, and there being no report from the railroad agents, the Call manager stopped the papers. He discovered later that the papers were sent during the weighing period. "I tried to get hold of Mr. Bowen," testified the Call manager, "and tried to find out if he had fully carried out his promise to have his agents look after our interests, but he was out of town, so I simply shut off the sample copies."

The bookkeeper of the Examiner testified that 505 copies of the Examiner were sent daily to the towns along the Bowen road for a period of thirty days, and that they were charged to Mr. Goldberg, of Goldberg, Bowen & Co.

NOT REPORTED TO WASHINGTON.

The Commission examined William C. Hammond, secretary to the superintendent of the railway mail service, eighth division, who testified that the report of Postal Clerk Gray regarding the bogus mail was never forwarded to Washington. "I took these slips in my hand," he testified, "to Superintendent Flint, and asked him what I should do in the case. I asked him whether I should include this in the report I was making out on the matter on which postage had been paid. He said 'No,' and took them from my hands and put them in his desk. He told me not to report it."

Superintendent Flint was examined. He testified that he had no recollection of the matter. The copybooks of his office were inspected, and they contained no record of a report having been made on the matter. Mr. Flint admitted that he knew Mr. Bowen, but denied that he was intimately acquainted.

Herbert P. Thrall, who had succeeded Mr. Flint as superintendent of the railway mail service in that division some days before the Commission made these discoveries, was also examined. He said he would report the facts to Washington immediately. The Bowen case was the only one he had discovered, he said, which "would seem to indicate fraud." Mr. Thrall testified that Mr. Flint and Mr. Bowen were not only friends, but "closely so."

He also testified, in response to questions by Representative William H. Moody, a member of the commission, that the fraudulent mail matter in question was sent over two other railroads, "innocent roads," in order to reach their destination. The papers traveled from San Francisco to Reno via the Southern Pacific, 244 miles, and the Nevada, California and Oregon Railroad, 35 miles, where they were turned over to the Bowen railroad.

Mr. Moody asked: "So that in case this turns out to be a fraud, then, for the sake of perpetrating this fraud on the Government in the transportation of this matter 30 miles, there has incidentally been perpetrated a fraud upon the Government by the transportation of this matter 279 miles on the two railroads, which you have named, apparently without knowledge or intent upon their part?" Mr. Thrall replied: "That is correct."

In the course of the investigation Senator Faulkner remarked: "In the last appropriation bill we put in a very severe penalty for stuffing the mails. We found one case two years ago on the Seaboard Air Line in which they attempted it, but they were discovered very quickly."

An interesting outline of the manner in which the mails may be and are stuffed for the benefit of the railroad companies was made the other day by a Government official, who requested that his name be witheld from the public because he did not care to incur the enmity of the railroads. He has been in close touch with the transportation of mails for more than ten years. He said:

"There are several ways in which the mails may be padded without detection. We know it is done, but we can't bring it home to anybody. For instance, there are hanging around the Capitol a lot of railroad lobbyists who keep close watch of the railway mail situation. When the weighing period in the section covering their particular railroad comes around they can easily obtain the franks of Members of Congress and of Senators, and send out great quantities of public documents, speeches, seeds, and other stuff, so that this matter goes over scales and is weighed as part of the average daily mail. Personally, I have no doubt that these fellows used Congressman Barlow's frank, and that he was innocent in the transaction.

"The Government documents thus sent out pay no revenue whatever. The matter is very heavy and bulky. Yet it is weighed by the pound, and counts as much in mail pay as first-class mail does. Every extra pound weighed for thirty days counts for 48 pounds in the four years' mail pay. Every dollar fraudulently gained during the weighing pays the railroads $48.

"Now that the period of weighing has been extended to ninety days, there is a bigger chance for them to pad the mails.

"The reason why Congress lengthened the weighing period was to obtain a better basis for estimating the average daily mail carried for four years. The thing works the other way just as well. The ninety-day period gives three times as good an opportunity for stuffing the mails as the thirty-day period gave. The 'average' thus obtained is just that much more a fraud upon the Government.

"It is probably true that no railroad company puts franked documents or other fraudulent matter into the mails during the weighing period. It doesn't have to, and the risk would be too great. It has friends who attend to that detail. The men who do this are experts at their business, and I don't see how you are going to detect them.

"Take the big mail routes as examples. Who is able to pick out a bag of franked matter on the Pennsylvania Railroad and prove that it is put there to pad the mails? Route No. 113001, between Washington and Philadelphia, carries 217,740 pounds of mail daily, according to the readjustment of July 1, 1905. In this great mass of mail matter, who can determine what is bogus during weighing time? Between Philadelphia and Pittsburg the average daily weight of mail is 362,006 pounds; between New York and Buffalo the average daily weight is 411,838 pounds, and between New York and Philadelphia, the heaviest mail route in the United States, the average daily weight of mail is 498,874 pounds.

"It is perfectly easy to stuff the mails on any of these routes and upon dozens of other routes without fear of detection. It is nonsense to say that it is not done. To prove it is quite another matter.

OTHER FRAUDULENT METHODS.

"One usual way of stuffing the mails is to divert newspaper bundles from the express to the mails during the weighing period. This was done more in former years than now, because the Department keeps a pretty close watch on these things. Another method is the distribution of circulars and catalogues advertising commercial houses, hotels, railroad companies, and so on. In the big cities a single commercial house may send out at any time of the year a thousand pounds of circulars or catalogues. If it happens to send this stuff out during the weighing period, it must be counted as part of the average daily mail, because there is nothing to show that fraud has been perpetrated.

"I have heard of cases where a lot of stuff was sent over a certain route upon which the weighing was going on, and then reshipped over another route a few weeks later, where the weighing clerks were at work. Thus bogus matter is made to do double duty for the benefit of more than one railroad.

"One of the bad features of this system is the constant temptation of postal inspectors by the railroads. I know of inspectors who have received great favors from the railroads in their districts. They are nicely treated always, they get transportation for their families and friends, and they make warm friends among the railroad men, who are invariably pleasant, congenial fellows. It is natural under these circumstances for an inspector to be a little easy at weighing time. He is not goiong to stir up trouble by seizing upon matter which he can't prove is fraudulent.

"The railroad boys say the weighing system is bad, because it fixes a daily average at the beginning of a four-year period, and makes no allowance for the normal growth of the mails. Some of the boys have hinted to me that the stuffing of the mails is the only way they could get even. They don't admit, of course, that the mails are padded, but they seem to think that if they were padded it would only reimburse the railroads for the increase of mail carried in the latter part of the four-year period.

"The conclusion of every man who has studied this matter, I should think, must be that the system of weighing the mails is very bad. The 'average daily weight' estimate is guesswork. No one knows what the legitimate daily weight actually is, even during the weighing period, because it may be stuffed, and probably is. How, then, can anybody tell what the daily weight is during the ensuing four years, when no count is made of the natural increase? The system is grossly unjust to the Government, which is liable to be defrauded by dishonest carriers, and it is unjust to honest carriers, who do not get an allowance for the natural increase of mail."

SAFES SENT BY MAIL—ABUSE IN THE DEPARTMENTS OF "GOVERNMENT—FREE"—MADDEN STATES THE FACTS—THIRD ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL TELLS HOUSE COMMITTEE HOW BILLIARD TABLES, OFFICE FURNITURE, AND SOMETIMES PERSONAL CHATTELS GO IN POSTAL CARS—SOURCE OF GRAFT TO RAILROADS.

[By Ira E. Bennett.]

Billiard tables, heavy steel safes, desks, chairs, lounges, carpets, canceling machines, typewriters, letter files, bookcases, and dozens of other articles, without regard to bulk or weight, are shipped through the United States mails at all times of the year according to testimony given yesterday by Edwin C. Madden, Third Assistant Postmaster-General, before the House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads. The weight of this matter runs up into millions of pounds annually.

Mr. Madden has charge of the finances of the Post-Office Department. It is his duty to make both ends meet, or at any rate to keep the income somewhere within gunshot of the outgo. He pointed out that the indiscriminate use of the "Government—free" penalty envelope by thousands of persons in the nine Executive Departments of the Government was one of the chief causes of the postal deficit. The Treasury Department is the worst offender, but all the Departments, he says, ride the free postal horse to death.

The Treasury Department, according to Mr. Madden, takes advantage of the "Government—free" mailing privilege to furnish the public buildings throughout the United States with furniture, carpets, and fixtures of all kinds. Sometimes this freight goes from Washington and sometimes from the factory direct.

BLANK BOOKS BY THE TON.

Printed matter in the shape of blank books and revenue stamps is mailed by the ton from the Treasury building. Big vans are employed by this and other Departments in handling the tons of supplies sent through the mails to Army and Navy headquarters, land offices, post-offices, mints, subtreasuries, courts, Indian agencies, weather stations, fish hatcheries, pension agencies, and other Government offices throughout the country.

Mr. Madden mentioned the shipment of a billiard table by mail from an Army post. It was part of the post equipment, and was, therefore, regarded as "Government—free." It was piled into a postal car and sent to its destination by the simple expedient of tying to it a "Government—free" envelope. The transfer of a big safe by mail is no uncommon thing, although it may weigh 1,000 pounds or more. The establishment of a Government office of any kind anywhere means the shipment by mail of desks, chairs, tables, and complete equipment. Sometimes personal effects are included, as a matter of course, in these shipments.

In 1899, when the report of the "weigh" of all mails was made, it was stated that this "Government free" matter, exclusive of bags and wrappings, constituted 12.58 per cent of the entire weight carried. Applying this ratio to the postal revenue from the public in 1904, Postmaster-General Cortelyou found that the matter carried free by the Government occasioned a loss of $20,000,000, in round numbers.

DONE IN WEIGHING PERIOD.

The transportation of this stuff goes on throughout the year, without regard to the weighing periods. There are four weighing sections in the United States. Every year the mails are weighed for ninety days in one of these sections. If it happens that a public building is to be furnished with safes, furniture, carpets, etc., and the stuff is sent in the mails through any section where weighing is going on, every pound goes upon the scales and helps to swell the estimate of the "average daily weight of mails." Upon this estimate the railroad companies are paid for mail transportation for the ensuing four years.

The railroads, therefore, are not at all averse to transporting safes, billiard tables, and other heavy freight as mail matter during the weighing period. If the stuff is sent at any other period subsequent to weighing the railroads get nothing extra for transportation. It is difficult to obtain evidence that influence is used with Department officials to stuff the mails with this character of freight during the weighing period, but some officials of the Post-Office Department express the conviction that improper influence is used in this direction. The way is always open for fraud, and no check worthy of the name is provided.

The injustice of throwing this vast bulk of freight into the mails, to be paid for by the Post-Office Department in its settlements with the railroads, consists not only in the overpayment to the railroads for transportation, but in placing upon the Post-Office Department the entire burden of mail carriage for the nine executive Departments. Mr. Madden made this clear to the Post-Office Committee, and indicated that, so long as the law permits the shipment of this stuff without regard to size or weight, by almost any official of the Government, and at periods whereby the railway mail pay is swelled, Congress must expect to face a deficit in the postal revenues.

WOULD CHARGE IT TO DEPARTMENTS.

Postmaster-General Cortelyou's remedy for this state of affairs is a proposal that each Department of the Government shall pay postage upon its mail matter according to its class. He said in his annual report:

"The weight of opinion seems to be in favor of this plan, so modified as to eliminate the necessity of affixing stamps, but maintaining the principle that each Department be charged with the whole expense of conducting its business. From this change there would come some great advantages; the tendency to use the mails for matter that ought to be otherwise transported would be restrained; merchandise, including heavy quantities of printed matter not requiring expeditious handling, would be sent by cheaper modes of conveyance; only matter requiring expeditious delivery and on which postage can properly be paid for as Government business would be sent by mail, and the true relation of the Post-Office Department to the other Departments as regards actual receipts and expenditures would be more accurately determined."

Chairman OVERSTREET, of the House Committee on Post-Offices, expressed the opinion yesterday that a law should be framed requiring each Executive Department to keep count for a year of its mail shipments, both as to weight and character. This would give a clew to the kind and quality of mail transported "Government free," and might furnish an idea of how heavily the mails are stuffed with this kind of matter, innocently or otherwise, in favor of the railroads. It would have a tendency, in his opinion, to put a stop to the shipment of billiard tables, safes, and heavy office furniture by revealing the identity of the offenders.

RECORDS AGAINST NUMBERS.

The fact has developed incidentally during the hearings of the House committee that a record is kept in the Post-Office Department of the quantity of franked matter sent out by every Senator and Representative and the time of shipment. Nearly every member of both branches of Congress, it is said, is on record as having unwittingly sent franked matter through the mails to some portion of the country at the time the mails were being weighed. This matter has thus added to the estimated daily average of mail transported by the railroads, and they have drawn pay accordingly.

It has been brought out that railroad lobbyists have approached clerks to Senators and Representatives, suggesting that they withhold bags of documents and other franked matter until such time as it might pass over routes then being weighed.

A Southern Representative asserted that he had received at his home 3,000 pounds of franked matter from Washington which he had not ordered and did not want. It came during the weighing period and passed over several railroad routes. He was unable to ascertain the identity of the person making the shipment. A Representative also intimated that he had been approached by the vice-president of a railroad company with the proposal that he should save up his franked matter and dispatch it over the railroad during the weighing period.

MAIL CARS WANTED—WOULD INCREASE COST OF SERVICE BY 5.75 PER CENT—DATA BEFORE COMMITTEE—DEPARTMENT URGES APPROPRIATION OF $43,250,000—FACTS SHOW MINIMUM OF $5,427 IS PAID IN RENTAL, WITH ANNUAL OUTLAY FOR MAINTENANCE OF $1,200—EXTRA AMOUNTS EARNED BASED ON WEIGHT CARRIED—MR. SHALLENBERGER FAILS TO GIVE LIGHT ON IMPORTANT POINT AT ISSUE.

[By Ira E. Bennett.]

The appropriation for railway mail transportation for the current fiscal year was $40,900,000, and the Post-Office Department asks for $43,250,000 for the next fiscal year, an increase of 5.75 per cent.

The appropriation for railway post-office cars for the current fiscal year was $5,875,000, and the Department asks for $6,021,000 for the next fiscal year, an increase of 2.48 per cent.

The appropriation for officers, clerks, and other items of the Railway Mail Service for the current year was $14,487,500, and $15,681,100 is asked for the next fiscal year, an increase of 8.24 per cent.

The increase in the length of railroad mail routes over the preceding fiscal year was 2.06 per cent; in length of railway postal car routes, 2.02 per cent, and in the number of pieces of ordinary mail matter handled was 5.77 per cent. Yet the increase of cost in transportation was 1.67 per cent; of postal cars, 4.08 per cent; in number of employees, 7.34 per cent, and in expenditure for employees, 10.74 per cent.

The percentage of increase in the total cost of the Railway Mail Service was 9.75 per cent, while in the total number of pieces handled it was only 5.77 per cent. If Congress grants the recommendations of the Department, the discrepancy between the expenditures and the amount of work performed will be still greater. This is not taking into account the out and out gift of $167,175 to certain railroads for "special facilities" or the losses sustained by failure of the Post-Office officials to exact fines from railroads for failing to perform their obligations.

INCREASE IN MAIL PAY.

The increase in the appropriation for railway mail pay, including both transportation and postal cars, was only 3.2 per cent for the current fiscal year over that of 1905. Yet the proposed increase for the ensuing fiscal year is 5.75, nearly double that of last year.

The bulk of the proposed increase of pay to the railroads is for railway post-office cars. The increased expense to the Government in the use of railway post-office cars is a matter of grave concern to Congress, and several matters have come to light in the past few days which are likely to call for further explanation. The railroads in some cases have secured chief clerks and other postal employees by paying them larger salaries, and these men are now employed in obtaining from the Post-Office Department additional postal cars for their employers. Postal clerks in some cases are suspected of being in the employ of the railroads over which they travel. Through them a demand is made for additional postal cars, and if the division superintendent is "all right" the increase is usually recommended.

The railroad companies make it a point to win and hold the good will of the postal authorities, from the head officials to the cheapest clerk. The families of railway postal clerks are carried free, and division superintendents and others are the recipients of valuable favors. It is these division superintendents, and not the post-office inspector, who have general supervision of the postal-car service.

CARS INCREASE RAPIDLY.

In the five years, from 1900 to 1905, inclusive, the number of full railway post-office cars increased 32.5 per cent. The number of pieces of mail handled during the same period increased 31.39 per cent, while the greater cost of the service was 50.28 per cent. When these figures were called to the attention of Second Assistant Postmaster-General Shallenberger the other day by Chairman OVERSTREET, of the House Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, Mr. Shallenberger explained that the cost of the service was dependent upon the "fineness of separation." He said the Department was separating mail in postal cars not only for distribution in cities, but for rural mail routes. Further questioning brought an admission from him that the attempt to separate rural-delivery mail on postal cars was not a success.

It was brought out in the hearings that three full lines of post-office cars are run over the same piece of railroad in the Southwest. Between Afton, Ind. T., and Sapulpa, a distance of 90 miles, two trains are run in the same direction twenty-five minutes apart, in the night, both carrying post-office cars. The cost of these two services is $4,500 a year.

Chairman OVERSTREET also brought out the fact that a full postal-car service exists between El Paso and Tucson, on the Southern Pacific, a distance of 312 miles, and that only two postal clerks are employed in the cars. All the mail handled by these clerks could be handled in apartment cars, thus saving the rental of postal cars—about $7,800 a year.

COULDN'T TELL THE WEIGHT.

Mr. FINLEY, of South Carolina, a member of the committee, asked Mr. Shallenberger to state the average weight of mail carried in railway post-office cars. Mr. Shallenberger replied that he did not have the information, and that the Department had no data of that kind. The Department, he admitted, made an "estimate" of the amount carried, in passing upon requests from the railroads for full railway post-office service. Mr. FINLEY wanted a little more light:

"Mr. FINLEY. Can your office give a statement of information along that line?

"Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I do not at present see how we could give a statement that would be at all intelligible."

The total number of railway post-office cars in service last year was 1,015, and the number in reserve was 215. The Government paid $5,500,044.65 for the cars in service, an average of $5,427.62 a car. The cars cost about $5,500 or $6,000 each and are maintained and repaired at an annual cost of about $1,200. They are built and owned by the railroad companies and rented to the Post-Office Department. The pay for a line of these cars is $25 a mile for 40-foot cars, $30 for 45-foot cars, $40 for 50-foot cars, and $50 for 55 or 60 foot cars. A "line" consists of a car each way every day over a specified route, with a car in reserve for use in case of accident. Three cars, as a rule, constitute a "line," although a short run may be covered by one car alone, in which case this one car receives full pay as an entire line.

REMAINS A MYSTERY.

Repeated efforts have been made by legislators and investigators generally to obtain from the Post-Office Department a statement of the money earned by railway post-office cars—not as lines, but as cars. This information has never yet been obtained. The Department officials insist that as the pay is for "lines," and not for particular cars, they are unable to furnish the information. It is said that some postal cars on certain routes earn as much as $10,000 a year each. This is in addition to the pay for the mail carried in the car, which is paid for by the pound.

The representatives of the railroads lay great stress upon the fact that a comparatively small amount of mail is carried in a postal car. Nobody knows just how much is carried—at least nobody who knows will tell. At first glance it would appear that the railroads should receive higher pay proportionately for a car carrying only 2 or 3 tons of mail than for a car carrying 20 or 30 tons. It is argued that while a freight car carries an immense amount of live paying freight in proportion to its own weight, a mail car carries a very small proportion of live weight. The fact is, however, that a railway mail car is fully paid for by the Government whether it carries a pound of mail or not. It earns pay by the mile, without regard to its load. If empty, it earns just as much as when full. If loaded, the weight of the load is paid for by the pound in addition to the rental of the car.

If a man should engage an expressman to haul his trunk to the station, and should pay for the service according to the weight of the trunk, and should then pay in addition a certain sum as rental of the wagon, according to the distance traveled, he would be conferring upon the expressman the same benefits as are conferred by the Government upon the railroads for the transportation of mail.

LIVELY SCRAMBLE FOR CARS.

It is not remarkable, under the circumstances, that there is a lively scramble for railway post-office cars by the railroads, and that the chief item of estimated increased expense of the service for the next fiscal year is for postal cars. Mr. Shallenberger told the committee that demands for railway post-office cars came from division superintendents, based upon personal information and from reports of chief clerks; from postmasters, and from postal clerks, who aimed to increase the number of crews, and thereby secure promotions; but he endeavored to remove from the committee's mind the impression that the railroads themselves demanded postal cars.

This colloquy illustrates how Mr. Shallenberger met the issue when pressed by Chairman OVERSTREET:

"The CHAIRMAN. Is is not true that railways often seek the establishment of new full railway post-office service in order to prevent competing lines from getting possession of mail which they would haul?

"Mr. SHALLENBERGER. They ask additional railway post-office service in addition to pay for transportation, both of which would justify them in putting on a given train service and expediting the mail.

"The CHAIRMAN. My question is, Do not roads often seek to have full railway post-office service established in order, by reason of that full railway post-office service on their lines, to prevent competing lines from getting the haul, as you give preference to a road where there is full railway post-office service—the natural preference—by reason of the fact that the mail is more readily worked on railway post-office cars; and as between two competing lines, one having a full railway post-office service and the other not having that service, the probabilities are that the one having the full railway post-office service will get the larger amount of pay?

SHALLENBERGER IS DIPLOMATIC.

"Mr. SHALLENBERGER. But I think I may say that we do not listen to the appeal for that railway post-office service for the reason stated—that a given line of railway post-office cars is preferred necessarily by the Department. It is only preferred when it will expedite the mail, hence a competing line, knowing that that is the only point involved, is just as likely to get the full railway post-office service as the line seeking to draw mail from it. There is no preference necessarily given to a line because it has railway post-office service, because we can get railway post-office service on any line.

"The CHAIRMAN. You never have any difficulty in having it inaugurated?

"Mr. SHALLENBERGER. No.

"The CHAIRMAN. They are always glad to have it inaugurated, are they not?

"Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Not always glad. When it is apartment-car service purely, which requires them to give us space without additional pay, they are not always ready to do it, but they are, as a rule, willing to do it—not anxious to do it."

At this point Chairman OVERSTREET dropped the subject, and the record fails to disclose any admission on the part of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General that the railroads are glad to secure full railway post-office service, which pays them an average of $5,427 a car at an annual cost for maintenance of $1,200.

WHAT REPORT DISCLOSES.

The report of the Second Assistant Postmaster-General shows that there was a net deduction of only $5,658.68 in the pay of the railway mail service during the fiscal year 1905. When questioned by the committee, Mr. Shallenberger acknowledged that the exaction of fines for certain failures had been practically abandoned, but he insisted that fines were still exacted in certain cases. Fines for delay in keeping schedules have been abandoned for the reason, as advanced by Mr. Shallenberger, that increased frequency of train service prevents any great delay in delivering the mails. When a train fails to make the only connection possible it is sometimes fined and sometimes not. There does not appear to be any rule in the matter.

When asked how the trains were kept up to schedule, Mr. Shallenberger replied that competition was all that was depended upon. "They feel that they will lose the mail if they do not carry it as well as the competing roads," he said. This testimony was received with interest, in view of the often-repeated assertion of the railroad representatives that the mails are carried at a loss.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, gentlemen who had intended to speak upon the bill have gone home on the idea that those to whom time has been yielded would take up the entire time for the day. I therefore move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Pending that motion, I would like to ask the gentleman a question. I would like to know whether this bill contains a provision for the restoration of the canteen?

Mr. HULL. Oh, no.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. It does not?

Mr. HULL. No.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Then I have this to say, Mr. Chairman, in face of all the evidence submitted on the canteen question, and in face of the unanimous demand of the Army for its restoration, if we fail to restore it we are cowards.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. DALZELL having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. BOUTELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 14397 and had come to no resolution thereon.

INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SHERMAN, by direction of the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported the bill (H. R. 15331) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with the various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1907; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I reserve all points of order on the bill.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. WACHTER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bills:

H. R. 7085. An act authorizing the Pea River Power Company to erect a dam in Coffee County, Ala.;

H. R. 8773. An act granting an increase of pension to William H. Joslin;

H. R. 11045. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize Washington and Westmoreland counties, in the State of Pennsylvania, to construct and maintain a bridge across the Monongahela River, in the State of Pennsylvania," approved February 21, 1903;

H. R. 11263. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the navigable waters of St. Andrews Bay;

H. R. 13567. An act to authorize the Campbell Lumber Company to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River, in Clay County, Ark., at or near the point where the section line between sections 21 and 28, township 19 north, range 9 east, touches said river; and

H. R. 13568. An act to authorize the Campbell Lumber Company to construct a bridge across the St. Francis River, in Clay County, Ark., at or near the point where the section line between sections 23 and 26, in township 20 north, range 9 east, touches said river.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee, as indicated below:

S. 4016. An act for establishing a light vessel off Nantucket Shoals, Massachusetts—to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

REPRINT OF BILL.

Mr. BROOKS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill (H. R. 14611) to establish a Bureau of Geology and Mining and the report accompanying it, being Report No. 1184.

There was no objection; and it was so ordered.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia submitting an estimate of appropriation for the Industrial Home School—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Commissioners of the District of Columbia submitting an estimate of appropriation for the deportation of nonresident insane persons and transportation of paupers—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the papers in the pension claims of Minerva and Elizabeth Robinson, contesting widows of James Robinson, with a letter from the Commissioner of Pensions recommedning such relief as Congress may give—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a reply in reference to the expenditures of the State of Texas on account of State volunteers or rangers in defense of the frontier—to the Committee on Appropriations.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a letter from the Secretary of Commerce and Labor submitting an estimate of appropriation for relief of officers and crew of relief light-vessel No. 58—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in response to the inquiry of the House, a statement as to appropriations for permanent specific and indefinite objects—to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting, with a copy of a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, a draft of a bill for the relief of Albert R. Herlig—to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of North Haven, Me.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, with a letter from the Chief of Engineers, report of examination of Cape Fear River at and below Wilmington, N. C.—to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and ordered to be printed.

A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting a correction of his response to the inquiry of the House as to the sale of the custom-house in New York City to the National City Bank—to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several Calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. REID, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 134) establishing an additional recording district in Indian Territory, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1556); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. TOWNSEND, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the Senate joint resolution (S. R. 32) instructing the Interstate Commerce Commission to make examinations into the subject of railroad discriminations and monopolies, and report on the same from time to time, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (N. 1557); which said joint resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 11946) to amend section 6 of an act approved February 8, 1887, entitled "An act to provide for the allotment of lands in severalty to Indians on the various reservations, and to extend the protection of the laws of the United States and the Territories over the Indians, and for other purposes," reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1558); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. BURNETT, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 13194) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to reclassify the public lands of Alabama, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1559); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ADAMSON, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 13937) granting an increase for the authorization of a light-ship to be placed on the outer bar of Brunswick, Ga., from $90,000 to $130,000, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1560); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. ESCH, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 14812) to authorize the purchase or construction of a steam or naphtha launch for use in the customs collection district of Norfolk, Va., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1561); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina, from the Committee on the Library, to which was referred the Senate joint resolution (S. R. 26) providing for the return of certain archives now in possession of the Department of State to the State of North Carolina, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1562); which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. OLCOTT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill of the House H. R. 13192, reported in lieu the bill (H. R. 15332) to incorporate the National Society of the Sons of the American Revolution, accompanied by a report (No. 1635); which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. VOLSTEAD, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10101) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell and convey to the State of Minnesota a certain tract of land situated in the county of Dakota, State of Minnesota, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1636); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 10480) for the relief of certain settlers upon land within the indemnity limits of the present St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba Railway Company, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1637); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MARTIN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 15085) to set apart certain lands in the State of South Dakota, to be known as the Battle Mountain Sanitarium Reserve, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1638); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. COLE, from the Committee on the Territories, to which was referred the bill of the House (H. R. 13675) to ratify and confirm the acts of the legislative assembly of the Territory of Oklahoma, passed in the year 1905, relating to an insane asylum for the Territory of Oklahoma, and providing for the establishment and maintenance of an insane asylum for the Territory of Oklahoma at Fort Supply, in Woodward County, Oklahoma Territory, and making appropriations therefor, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1676); which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions of the following titles were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. McKINLEY of Illinois, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs, to which was referred the bill of the Senate (S. 4198) granting permission to Prof. Simon Newcomb, United States Navy, retired, to accept the decoration of the order "Pour le Mérite, für Wissenschaften und Kunste," reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 1554); which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, February 22, 1906.

The Chaplain, Rev. EDWARD E. HALE, offered the following prayer:

Who raised up the righteous man? Who called him to His foot, gave the nations before him, and made him rule over kings? Who hath wrought and done it? I, the Lord, the first and with the last, I am He.

Father Almighty, King of Kings and Lord of Lords, and our Father as well, we ask Thee to consecrate to us every memory of him whom Thou wert pleased to send forward—first in war, first in peace, and first in the hearts of his countrymen. O, God, make the people of this land remember him and his; remember what this obedience to the divine law is; remember that the fathers sought Thee and found Thee, because they sought for Thee with all their heart and will and soul and strength.

That fathers and mothers may teach their children such honor, such loyalty, such unselfishness as his, that boys and girls may grow up into men and women ready to die for their country or to live for their country—not in vain that we have the memories of this sacred day.

Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is done in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread. Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us. Lead us not into temptation. But deliver us from evil. For thine is the kingdom, is the power, is the glory, for ever. Amen.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

READING OF WASHINGTON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The address of George Washington will be read, under the order of the Senate, by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. MCCREARY].

Mr. MCCREARY (at the Secretary's desk) read the address, as follows:

An address of George Washington to the people of the United States, September 19, 1796.

To the people of the United States:

FRIENDS AND FELLOW-CITIZENS: The period for a new election of a citizen to administer the executive government of the United States being not far distant, and the time actually arrived when your thoughts must be employed in designating the person who is to be clothed with that important trust, it appears to me proper, especially as it may conduce to a more distinct expression of the public voice, that I should now apprise you of the resolution I have formed to decline being considered among the number of those out of whom a choice is to be made.

I beg you at the same time to do me the justice to be assured that this resolution has not been taken without a strict regard to all the considerations appertaining to the relation which binds a dutiful citizen to his country; and that in withdrawing the tender of service, which silence in my situation might imply, I am influenced by no diminution of zeal for your future interest, no deficiency of grateful respect for your past kindness, but am supported by a full conviction that the step is compatible with both.

The acceptance of and continuance hitherto in the office to which your suffrages have twice called me have been a uniform sacrifice of inclination to the opinion of duty and to a deference for what appeared to be your desire. I constantly hoped that it would have been much earlier in my power, consistently with motives which I was not at liberty to disregard, to return to that retirement from which I had been reluctantly drawn. The strength of my inclination to do this previous to the last election had even led to the preparation of an address to declare it to you; but mature reflection on the then perplexed and critical posture of our affairs with foreign nations and the unanimous advice of persons entitled to my confidence impelled me to abandon the idea. I rejoice that the state of your concerns, external as well as internal, no longer renders the pursuit of inclination incompatible with the sentiment of duty or propriety, and am persuaded, whatever partiality may be retained for my services, that in the present circumstances of our country you will not disapprove my determination to retire.

The impressions with which I first undertook the arduous trust were explained on the proper occasion. In the discharge of this trust I will only say that I have, with good intentions, contributed toward the organization and administration of the Government the best exertions of which a very fallible judgment was capable. Not unconscious in the outset of the inferiority of my qualifications, experience, in my own eyes, perhaps still more in the eyes of others, has strengthened the motives to diffidence of myself; and every day the increasing weight of years admonishes me more and more that the shade of retirement is as necessary to me as it will be welcome. Satisfied that if any circumstances have given peculiar value to my services they were temporary, I have the consolation to believe that, while choice and prudence invite me to quit the political scene, patriotism does not forbid it.

In looking forward to the moment which is intended to terminate the career of my political life my feelings do not permit me to suspend the deep acknowledgment of that debt of gratitude which I owe to my beloved country for the many honors it has conferred upon me; still more for the steadfast confidence with which it has supported me, and for the opportunities I have thence enjoyed of manifesting my inviolable attachment by services faithful and persevering, though in usefulness unequal to my zeal. If benefits have resulted to our country from these services, let it always be remembered to your praise and as an instructive example in our annals that under circumstances in which the passions, agitated in every direction, were liable to mislead; amidst appearances sometimes dubious; vicissitudes of fortune often discouraging; in situations in which not unfrequently want of success has countenanced the spirit of criticism, the constancy of your support was the essential prop of the efforts and a guaranty of the plans by which they were effected. Profoundly penetrated with this idea, I shall carry it with me to my grave as a strong incitement to unceasing vows that Heaven may continue to you the choicest tokens of its beneficence; that your union and brotherly affection may be perpetual; that the free Constitution which is the work of your hands may be sacredly maintained; that its administration in every department may be stamped with wisdom and virtue; that, in fine, the happiness of the people of these States, under the auspices of liberty, may be made complete by so careful a preservation and so prudent a use of this blessing as will acquire to them the glory of recommending it to the applause, the affection, and adoption of every nation which is yet a stranger to it.

Here, perhaps, I ought to stop. But a solicitude for your welfare which can not end but with my life, and the apprehension of danger natural to that solicitude, urge me on an occasion like the present to offer to your solemn contemplation and to recommend to your frequent review some sentiments which are the result of much reflection, of no inconsiderable observation, and which appear to me all-important to the permanency of your felicity as a people. These will be offered to you with the more freedom as you can only see in them the disinterested warnings of a parting friend, who can possibly have no personal motive to bias his counsel. Nor can I forget as an encouragement to it your indulgent reception of my sentiments on a former and not dissimilar occasion.

Interwoven as is the love of liberty with every ligament of your hearts, no recommendation of mine is necessary to fortify or confirm the attachment.

The unity of government which constitutes you one people is also now dear to you. It is justly so, for it is a main pillar in the edifice of your real independence, the support of your tranquillity at home, your peace abroad, of your safety, of your prosperity, of that very liberty which you so highly prize. But as it is easy to foresee that from different causes and from different quarters much pains will be taken, many artifices employed, to weaken in your minds the conviction of this truth, as this is the point in your political fortress against which the batteries of internal and external enemies will be most constantly and actively (though often covertly and insidiously) directed, it is of infinite moment that you should properly estimate the immense value of your national union to your collective and individual happiness; that you should cherish a cordial, habitual, and immovable attachment to it, accustoming yourselves to think and speak of it as of the palladium of your political safety and prosperity; watching for its preservation with jealous anxiety; discountenancing whatever may suggest even a suspicion that it can in any event be abandoned, and indignantly frowning upon the first dawning of every attempt to alienate any portion of our country from the rest or to enfeeble the sacred ties which now link together the various parts.

For this you have every inducement of sympathy and interest. Citizens by birth or choice of a common country, that couptry has a right to concentrate your affections. The name of American, which belongs to you in your national capacity, must always exalt the just pride of patriotism more than any appellation derived from local discriminations. With slight shades of difference, you have the same religion, manners, habits, and political principles. You have in a common cause fought and triumphed together. The independence and liberty you possess are the work of joint counsels and joint efforts, of common dangers, sufferings, and successes.

But these considerations, however powerfully they address themselves to your sensibility, are greatly outweighed by those which apply more immediately to your interest. Here every portion of our country finds the most commanding motives for carefully guarding and preserving the union of the whole.

The North, in an unrestrained intercourse with the South, protected by the equal laws of a common government, finds in the productions of the latter great additional resources of maritime and commercial enterprise and precious materials of manufacturing industry. The South, in the same intercourse, benefiting by the same agency of the North, sees its agriculture grow and its commerce expand. Turning partly into its own channels the seamen of the North, it finds its particular navigation invigorated, and while it contributes in different ways to nourish and increase the general mass of the national navigation, it looks forward to the protection of a maritime strength to which itself is unequally adapted. The East, in a like intercourse with the West, already finds, and in the progressive improvements of interior communications by land and water will more and more find, a valuable vent for the commodities which it brings from abroad or manufactures at home. The West derives from the East supplies requisite to its growth and comfort, and what is perhaps of still greater consequence, it must of necessity owe the secure enjoyment of indispensable outlets for its own productions to the weight, influence, and the future maritime strength of the Atlantic side of the Union, directed by an indissoluble community of interest as one nation. Any other tenure by which the West can hold this essential advantage, whether derived from its own separate strength or from an apostate and unnatural connection with any foreign power, must be intrinsically precarious.

While, then, every part of our country thus feels an immediate and particular interest in union, all the parts combined can not fail to find in the united mass of means and efforts greater strength, greater resource, proportionately greater security from external danger, a less frequent interruption of their peace by foreign nations, and, what is of inestimable value, they must derive from union an exemption from those broils and wars between themselves which so frequently afflict neighboring countries not tied together by the same governments, which their own rivalships alone would be sufficient to produce, but which opposite foreign alliances, attachments, and intrigues would stimulate and embitter. Hence, likewise, they will avoid the necessity of those overgrown military establishments which, under any form of government, are inauspicious to liberty, and which are to be regarded as particularly hostile to republican liberty. In this sense it is that your union ought to be considered as a main prop of your liberty, and that the love of the one ought to endear to you the preservation of the other.

These considerations speak a persuasive language to every reflecting and virtuous mind, and exhibit the continuance of the Union as a primary object of patriotic desire. Is there a doubt whether a common government can embrace so large a sphere? Let experience solve it. To listen to mere speculation in such a case were criminal. We are authorized to hope that a proper organization of the whole, with the auxiliary agency of governments for the respective subdivisions, will afford a happy issue to the experiment. It is well worth a fair and full experiment. With such powerful and obvious motives to union affecting all parts of our country, while experience shall not have demonstrated its impracticability, there will always be reason to distrust the patriotism of those who in any quarter may endeavor to weaken its bands.

In contemplating the causes which may disturb our Union, it occurs as matter of serious concern that any ground should have been furnished for characterizing parties by geographical discriminations—Northern and Southern, Atlantic and Western—whence designing men may endeavor to excite a belief that there is a real difference of local interests and views. One of the expedients of a party to acquire influence within particular districts is to misrepresent the opinions and aims of other districts. You can not shield yourselves too much against the jealousies and heartburnings which spring from these misrepresentations; they tend to render alien to each other those who ought to be bound together by fraternal affection. The inhabitants of our western country have lately had a useful lesson on this head. They have seen in the negotiation by the Executive and in the unanimous ratification by the Senate of the treaty with Spain, and in the universal satisfaction at that event throughout the United States, a decisive proof how unfounded were the suspicions propagated among them of a policy in the General Government and in the Atlantic States unfriendly to their interests in regard to the Mississippi. They have been witnesses to the formation of two treaties—that with Great Britain and that with Spain—which secure to them everything they could desire in respect to our foreign relations toward confirming their prosperity. Will it not be their wisdom to rely for the preservation of these advantages on the union by which they were procured? Will they not henceforth be deaf to those advisers, if such there are, who would sever them from their brethren and connect them with aliens?

To the efficacy and permanency of your union a government for the whole is indispensable. No alliances, however strict, between the parts can be an adequate substitute. They must inevitably experience the infractions and interruptions which all alliances in all times have experienced. Sensible of this momentous truth, you have improved upon your first essay by the adoption of a constitution of government better calculated than your former for an intimate union and for the efficacious management of your common concerts. This Government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government. But the constitution which at any time exists, till changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all. The very idea of the power and the right of the people to establish government presupposes the duty of every individual to obey the established government.

All obstructions to the execution of the laws, all combinations and associations, under whatever plausible character, with the real design to direct, control, counteract, or awe the regular deliberation and action of the constituted authorities, are destructive of this fundamental principle and of fatal tendency. They serve to organize faction; to give it an artificial and extraordinary force; to put in the place of the delegated will of the nation the will of a party, often a small but artful and enterprising minority of the community, and, according to the alternate triumphs of different parties, to make the public administration the mirror of the ill-concerted and incongruous projects of faction rather than the organ of consistent and wholesome plans, digested by common counsels and modified by mutual interests.

However combinations or associations of the above description may now and then answer popular ends, they are likely in the course of time and things to become potent engines by which cunning, ambitious, and unprincipled men will be enabled to subvert the power of the people, and to usurp for themselves the reins of government, destroying afterwards the very engines which have lifted them to unjust dominion.

Toward the preservation of your Government and the permanency of your present happy state it is requisite not only that you steadily discountenance irregular oppositions to its acknowledged authority, but also that you resist with care the spirit of innovation upon its principles, however specious the pretexts. One method of assault may be to effect in the forms of the Constitution alterations which may impair the energy of the system, and thus to undermine what can not be directly overthrown. In all the changes to which you may be invited remember that time and habit are at least as necessary to fix the true character of governments as other human institutions; that experience is the surest standard by which to test the real tendency of the existing constitution of a country; that facility in changes upon the credit of mere hypothesis and opinion exposes to perpetual change, from the endless variety of hypothesis and opinion; and remember especially that for the efficient management of your common interests in a country so extensive as ours a government of as much vigor as is consistent with the perfect security of liberty is indispensable. Liberty itself will find in such a government, with powers properly distributed and adjusted, its surest guardian. It is, indeed, little else than a name where the government is too feeble to withstand the enterprises of faction, to confine each member of the society within the limits prescribed by the laws, and to maintain all in the secure and tranquil enjoyment of the rights of person and property.

I have already intimated to you the danger of parties in the state, with particular reference to the founding of them on geographical discriminations. Let me now take a more comprehensive view, and warn you in the most solemn manner against the baneful effects of the spirit of party generally.

The spirit, unfortunately, is inseparable from our nature, having its root in the strongest passions of the human mind. It exists under different shapes in all governments, more or less stifled, controlled, or repressed; but in those of the popular form it is seen in its greatest rankness and is truly their worst enemy.

The alternate domination of one faction over another, sharpened by the spirit of revenge natural to party dissension, which in different ages and countries has perpetrated the most horrid enormities, is itself a frightful despotism. But this leads at length to a more formal and permanent despotism. The disorders and miseries which result gradually incline the minds of men to seek security and repose in the absolute power of an individual, and sooner or later the chief of some prevailing faction, more able or more fortunate than his competitors, turns this disposition to the purposes of his own elevation on the ruins of public liberty.

Without looking forward to an extremity of this kind (which nevertheless ought not to be entirely out of sight), the common and continual mischiefs of the spirit of party are sufficient to make it the interest and duty of a wise people to discourage and restrain it.

It serves always to distract the public councils and enfeeble the public administration. It agitates the community with ill-founded jealousies and false alarms; kindles the animosity of one part against another; foments occasionally riot and insurrection. It opens the door to foreign influence and corruption, which find a facilitated access to the Government itself through the channels of party passion. Thus the policy and the will of one country are subjected to the policy and will of another.

There is an opinion that parties in free countries are useful checks upon the administration of the government and serve to keep alive the spirit of liberty. This within certain limits is probably true, and in governments of a monarchical cast patriotism may look with indulgence, if not with favor, upon the spirit of party. But in those of the popular character, in governments purely elective, it is a spirit not to be encouraged. From their natural tendency it is certain there will always be enough of that spirit for every salutary purpose, and there being constant danger of excess, the effort ought to be by force of public opinion to mitigate and assuage it. A fire not to be quenched, it demands a uniform vigilance to prevent its bursting into a flame, lest instead of warming it should consume.

It is important, likewise, that the habits of thinking in a free country should inspire caution in those intrusted with its administration to confine themselves within their respective constitutional spheres, avoiding in the exercise of the powers of one department to encroach upon another. The spirit of encroachment tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one, and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism. A just estimate of that love of power and proneness to abuse it which predominates in the human heart is sufficient to satisfy us of the truth of this position. The necessity of reciprocal checks in the exercise of political power, by dividing and distributing it into different depositories, and constituting each the guardian of the public weal against invasions by others, has been evinced by experiments, ancient and modern, some of them in our country and under our own eyes. To preserve them must be as necessary as to institute them. If in the opinion of the people the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation; for though this in one instance may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield.

Of all the dispositions and habits which lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness, these firmest props of the duty of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and to cherish them. A volume could not trace all their connections with private and public felicity. Let it simply be asked, Where is the security for property, for reputation, for life, if the sense of religious obligation desert the oaths which are the instruments of investigation in courts of justice? And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be maintained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule, indeed, extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric? Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of a government gives force to public opinion it is essential that public opinion should be enlightened.

As a very important source of strength and security, cherish public credit. One method of preserving it is to use it as sparingly as possible, avoiding occasions of expense by cultivating peace, but remembering also that timely disbursements to prepare for danger frequently prevent much greater disbursement to repel it; avoiding likewise the accumulation of debt, not only by shunning occasions of expense, but by vigorous exertions in time of peace to discharge the debts which unavoidable wars have occasioned, not ungenerously throwing upon posterity the burthen which we ourselves ought to bear. The execution of these maxims belongs to your representatives; but it is necessary that public opinion should cooperate. To facilitate to them the performance of their duty it is essential that you should practically bear in mind that toward the payment of debts there must be revenue; that to have revenue there must be taxes; that no taxes can be devised which are not more or less inconvenient and unpleasant; that the intrinsic embarrassment inseparable from the selection of the proper objects (which is always a choice of difficulties) ought to be a decisive motive for a candid construction of the conduct of the Government in making it, and for a spirit of acquiescence in the measures for obtaining revenue which the public exigencies may at any time dictate.

Observe good faith and justice toward all nations. Cultivate peace and harmony with all. Religion and morality enjoin this conduct. And can it be that good policy does not equally enjoin it? It will be worthy of a free, enlightened, and at no distant period a great nation to give to mankind the magnanimous and too novel example of a people always guided by an exalted justice and benevolence. Who can doubt that in the course of time and things the fruits of such a plan would richly repay any temporary advantages which might be lost by a steady adherence to it? Can it be that Providence has not connected the permanent felicity of a nation with its virtue? The experiment, at least, is recommended by every sentiment which ennobles human nature. Alas! is it rendered impossible by its vices?

In the execution of such a plan nothing is more essential than that permanent, inveterate antipathies against particular nations and passionate attachments for others should be excluded, and that in place of them just and amicable feelings toward all should be cultivated. The nation which indulges toward another an habitual hatred or an habitual fondness is in some degree a slave. It is a slave to its animosity or to its affection, either of which is sufficient to lead it astray from its duty and its interest. Antipathy in one nation against another disposes each more readily to offer insult and injury, to lay hold of slight causes of umbrage, and to be haughty and intractable when accidental or trifling occasions of dispute occur.

Hence frequent collisions, obstinate, envenomed, and bloody contests. The nation prompted by ill will and resentment sometimes impels to war the government contrary to the best calculations of policy. The government sometimes participates in the national propensity, and adopts through passion what reason would reject. At other times it makes the animosity of the nation subservient to projects of hostility, instigated by pride, ambition, and other sinister and pernicious motives. The peace often, sometimes perhaps the liberty, of nations has been the victim.

So, likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter without adequate inducement or justification. It leads also to concessions to the favorite nation of privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealously, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from which equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens (who devote themselves to the favorite nation) facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country without odium, sometimes even with popularity, gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation a commendable deference for public opinion or a laudable zeal for public good the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation.

As avenues to foreign influence in innumerable ways, such attachments are particularly alarming to the truly enlightened and independent patriot. How many opportunities do they afford to tamper with domestic factions, to practice the arts of seduction, to mislead public opinion, to influence or awe the public councils? Such an attachment of a small or weak toward a great and powerful nation dooms the former to be the satellite of the latter. Against the insidious wiles of foreign influence (I conjure you to believe me, fellow-citizens) the jealousy of a free people ought to be constantly awake, since history and experience prove that foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government. But that jealousy, to be useful, must be impartial, else it becomes the instrument of the very influence to be avoided, instead of a defense against it. Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike of another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other. Real patriots who may resist the intrigues of the favorite are liable to become suspected and odious, while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people to surrender their interests.

The great rule of conduct for us in regard to foreign nations is, in extending our commercial relations, to have with them as little political connection as possible. So far as we have already formed engagements, let them be fulfilled with perfect good faith. Here let us stop.

Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves by artificial ties in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics or the ordinary combinations and collisons of her frendships or enmities.

Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course. If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality we may at any time resolve upon to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent nations, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not legally hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interests, guided by justice, shall counsel.

Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?

It is our true policy to steer clear of permanent alliances with any portion of the foreign world, so far, I mean, as we are now at liberty to do it; for let me not be understood as capable of patronizing infidelity to existing engagements. I hold the maxim no less applicable to public than to private affairs that honesty is always the best policy. I repeat, therefore, let those engagements be observed in their genuine sense. But, in my opinion, it is unnecessary and would be unwise to extend them.

Taking care always to keep ourselves by suitable establishments on a respectable defensive posture, we may safely trust to temporary alliances for extraordinary emergencies.

Harmony, liberal intercourse with all nations are recommended by policy, humanity, and interest. But even our commercial policy should hold an equal and impartial hand, neither seeking nor granting exclusive favors or preferences; consulting the natural course of things; diffusing and diversifying by gentle means the streams of commerce, but forcing nothing; establishing with powers so disposed, in order to give trade a stable course, to define the rights of our merchants, and to enable the Government to support them, conventional rules of intercourse, the best that present circumstances and mutual opinion will permit, but temporary and liable to be from time to time abandoned or varied as experience and circumstances shall dictate; constantly keeping in view that it is folly in one nation to look for disinterested favors from another; that it must pay with a portion of its independence for whatever it may accept under that character; that by such acceptance it may place itself in the condition of having given equivalents for nominal favors, and yet of being reproached with ingratitude for not giving more. There can be no greater error than to expect or calculate upon real favors from nation to nation. It is an illusion which experience must cure, which a just pride ought to discard.

In offering to you, my countrymen, these counsels of an old and affectionate friend I dare not hope they will make the strong and lasting impression I could wish—that they will control the usual current of the passions or prevent our nation from running the course which has hitherto marked the destiny of nations. But if I may even flatter myself that they may be productive of some partial benefit, some occasional good—that they may now and then recur to moderate the fury of party spirit, to warn against the mischiefs of foreign intrigue, to guard against the impostures of pretended patriotism—this hope will be a full recompense for the solicitude for your welfare by which they have been dictated.

How far in the discharge of my official duties I have been guided by the principles which have been delineated the public records and other evidences of my conduct must witness to you and to the world. To myself, the assurance of my own conscience is that I have at least believed myself to be guided by them.

In relation to the still subsisting war in Europe my proclamation of the 22d of April, 1793, is the index to my plan. Sanctioned by your approving voice, and by that of your representatives in both Houses of Congress, the spirit of that measure has continually governed me, uninfluenced by any attempts to deter or divert me from it.

After deliberate examination, with the aid of the best lights I could obtain, I was well satisfied that our country, under all the circumstances of the case, had a right to take and was bound in duty and interest to take a neutral position. Having taken it, I determined, as far as should depend upon me, to maintain it with moderation, perseverence, and firmness.

The considerations which respect the right to hold this conduct it is not necessary on this occasion to detail. I will only observe that, according to my understanding of the matter, that right, so far from being denied by any of the belligerent powers, has been virtually admitted by all.

The duty of holding a neutral conduct may be inferred, without anything more, from the obligation which justice and humanity impose on every nation, in cases in which it is free to act, to maintain inviolate the relations of peace and amity toward other nations.

The inducements of interest for observing that conduct will best be referred to your own reflections and experience. With me a predominant motive has been to endeavor to gain time to our country to settle and mature its yet recent institutions, and to progress without interruption to that degree of strength and consistency which is necessary to give it, humanly speaking, the command of its own fortunes.

Though in reviewing the incidents of my Administration I am unconscious of intentional error, I am, nevertheless, too sensible of my defects not to think it probable that I may have committed many errors. Whatever they may be, I fervently beseech the Almighty to avert or mitigate the evils to which they may tend. I shall also carry with me the hope that my country will never cease to view them with indulgence, and that, after forty-five years of my life dedicated to its service with an upright zeal, the faults of incompetent abilities will be consigned to oblivion, as myself must soon be to the mansions of rest.

Relying on its kindness in this as in other things, and actuated by that fervent love toward it which is so natural to a man who views it in the native soil of himself and his progenitors for several generations, I anticipate with pleasing expectation that retreat in which I promise myself to realize without alloy the sweet enjoyment of partaking in the midst of my fellow-citizens the benign influence of good laws under a free government—the ever-favorite object of my heart, and the happy reward, as I trust, of our mutual cares, labors, and dangers.

GO: WASHINGTON.

UNITED STATES, September 19, 1796.

ALBERT R. HEILIG.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office inclosing the draft of a proposed bill for the relief of Albert R. MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12320) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House had passed the joint resolution (S. R. 26) providing for the return of certain archives now in possession of the Department of State to the State of North Carolina.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. 3318) to allow the entry and clearance of vessels at San Luis Obispo, Port Harford, and Monterey, Cal., and it was thereupon signed by the Vice-President.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SCOTT presented a petition of sundry citizens of Elizabeth, W. Va., praying for an investigation of the charges made and filed against Hon. REED SMOOT, a Senator from the State of Utah; which was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Moundsville; of Garfield Council, No. 3, Junior Order of United American Mechanics, of Benwood, and of sundry citizens of McMechen, all in the State of West Virginia, praying for the enactment of legislation to restrict immigration and for a revision of the laws governing naturalization; which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. BRANDEGEE presented a petition of 56 citizens of Meriden, Conn., praying for an investigation of the existing conditions in the Kongo Free State; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Manchester, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation to prevent the impending destruction of Niagara Falls on the American side by the diversion of the waters for manufacturing purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Forest Reservations and the Protection of Game.

He also presented a petition of the Afternoon Musical Society, of Danbury, Conn., praying for the passage of the so-called "pure-food bill;" which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LONG presented a petition of Hoisington Lodge, No. 564, Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen, of Hoisington, Kans., praying for the passage of the so-called "employers' liability bill" and also the "anti-injunction bill;" which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. ELKINS. I have been directed by the Committee on Interstate Commerce to present to the Senate a great many telegrams received by the committee in relation to the Hepburn bill and rate legislation generally, and to ask that these telegrams may be printed as a public document.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none, and that order will be made.

Mr. ELKINS presented sundry affidavits to accompany the bill (S. 2577) granting an increase of pension to F. M. Lynch; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WETMORE presented a petition of the congregation of the Church of the Ascension, of Auburn, R. I., praying for the enactment of legislation to regulate the interstate transportation of intoxicating liquors; which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, Washington, R. I., and a petition of the congregation of the Coventry Central Baptist Church, of Anthony, R. I., praying for an investigation of the charges made and filed against Hon. REED SMOOT, a Senator from the State of Utah; which were referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. TILLMAN. I present a memorial of the Independent Refiners' Association, composed of independent oil companies of Titusville, Pa.; and Oil City, Pa., relative to railroad rate legislation. It is a very interesting and instructive document, and I ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina asks that the memorial presented by him be read and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The memorial is as follows:

INDEPENDENT REFINERS' ASSOCIATION,
Titusville, Pa., February 20, 1906.

To the President and Members of the United States Senate and House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

GENTLEMEN: At this time when the railroad rate question is being generally discussed in hope of some final profitable action on the matter by Congress, it seems to be the duty of interested citizens to give such information on the subject as they can for the use of yourself, Congress, and the people to assist in showing the defects of the present laws, and the needed radical changes, if full justice is intended to be afforded by plain law, for the unprotected public.

As cases that are typical in showing what a travesty on protection is represented in the present method of legal procedure in dealing with the subject, and as making clear the need of guarding against nullifying or delaying provisions in the enactment of new rate legislation, an examination is invited of the public record of a group of cases instituted over seventeen years ago, whose final disposition is still pending. They are what are generally known as the "Independent Oil Refiners' cases" against a number of railroad companies, and were first placed before the Interstate Commerce Commission in 1888. In the shifting processes of delay they have been dragging from the Interstate Commerce Commission to the United States courts all the intervening years, with no finished result beyond that of demonstrating the sham of existing methods of holding the railroad companies to accountability for the abuse of their powers.

Chronologic statement.—Increase of freight rate on refined petroleum by railroads, September 13, 1888; complaints Nos. 153 and 154 before the Interstate Commerce Commission, filed December 4, 1888; complaint No. 163 before the Interstate Commerce Commission, filed January 30, 1889; hearing by the Interstate Commerce Commission, May 15, 1889; decision by Commission against railroad for unjust discrimination (5 I. C. C. Rep., 415), November 14, 1892; rehearing granted by Commission (6 I. C. C. Rep., 52), October 19, 1893; decision by Interstate Commerce Commission, awarding reparation to refiners (6 I. C. C. Rep., 378), October 22, 1895; proceeding instituted by the Interstate Commerce Commission before the United States circuit court to enforce its order, May, 1896; decision of the United States circuit court declining jurisdiction of reparation claims on its equity side, July, 1897; question of unjust discrimination still pending at present time (82 Fed. Rep., 192), February, 1906; decision on the law side of United States circuit court on damage claims in favor of refiners, May, 1902; judgments rendered by United States court, February, 1903; judgments set aside by the United States circuit court of appeals (137 Fed. Rep., 343), May, 1905; on appeal to the United States Supreme Court, February, 1906; after over seventeen years the increased rate still in effect, the railroads continuing to refuse to obey the Interstate Commerce Commission, February, 1906.

The main cause for these complaints may be stated briefly, as follows: From the years 1881 to 1885 the public railroad freight rate on refined oil, in barrels, from the Pennsylvania oil regions to New York Harbor, for export, was from 35 to 39 cents per barrel.

From 1885 to September 13, 1888, the rate was 52 cents per barrel, and a very large volume of business was being done at that rate.

On September 13, 1888, the rate was advanced to 66 cents, a wholly prohibitive tariff. The only reason given by the railroads for this advance is stated in a letter written by the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company to the shippers, dated August 27, 1888. "The advance of rates has been in accordance with the methods prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission for charging for the carriage of oil, and against which we protested. I regret extremely that any advance in the rates for the transportation of oil which has been forced upon us by the Interstate Commerce Commission should work harshly upon your interests." (Petitioners' Exhibit, No. 15.)

He also said of this advanced rate: "I did not want to do it; I would rather have it remain." (Testimony, p. 537.)

The head of the freight department of the New York, Lake Erie and Western Railroad Company wrote, under date of October 11, 1888:

"The present (increased) tariff on oil was agreed upon at a conference between the principal trunk lines immediately after the decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission in the Scofield case in order to strictly comply with the law, as ordered by the Commission." (Petitioners' Exhibit, No. 20.)

About November 24, 1888, the Interstate Commerce Commission issued a public statement: "Retank and barrel rates on oil" (2 Interstate Com. Rep., 245), in which they notice that these new increased rates had been made on oil and that the railroads had stated that they were made "in accordance with the directions of the Interstate Commerce Commission." The matter was explained at length, including a personal interview with the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, in which he "was understood to say that the motive in making the (increase) change was not a dissatisfaction with the former rates." The Commission in closing said: "It is nevertheless obliged to say that the assumption on which the railroad circulars (making the increased rates) have been issued is not well founded. The Commission has made no decision applicable to the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, which would require an advance in rates. The circular is open to the construction that something done or said by the Commission requires or justifies an advance in barrel rates. This is not the case."

It was fully expected after this notice that the former rates would at once be restored, and they were by the New York Central Railroad, by published notice of December 1, 1888, that the "rates on oil will be the same as before September 3." But, on December 5, 1888, they were again advanced; the general traffic manager, writing to the refiners and shippers under date of December 4, 1888, said that when the advanced rate was canceled and restored to the old rate, "we had not conferred on the subject with the other railroad companies interested and we now find that our action is not concurred in by them."

Complaint was therefore made by the shippers to the Interstate Commerce Commission December 4, 1888. The president of the Pennsylvania railroad when asked to explain why the rates had not been restored after the notice of the Commission that the advance had not been caused or justified by any action, direction, or order of the Interstate Commerce Commission, replied: "That was their view of the case, but it was not shared in by us." (Testimony, p. 542.)

This extortionate advance, under these inexcusably insulting and arbitrary circumstances, was made now over seventeen years ago, and, hard as it may be for the general public to believe, remains still in force, though the complainant petitioners to the Interstate Commerce Commission have used every legal avenue for relief and reparation with the utmost diligence and business care on their part. What is the result after these seventeen years? That particular barrel traffic is entirely lost to the railroads. Of the original shippers many are dead, some dying bankrupt and some now living insolvent, because the awarded reparation damages for overcharge have not been paid to them; many have gone out of the business with loss and disgust, who entered it expecting the interstate-commerce law would protect them from the old style railroad outlawry of rebates, overcharges, and favored shippers. The survivors, who never dreamed that this law could be used to destroy instead of to protect their business, have carried on this just claim for equity and reparation at an extraordinary expense, and now feel, after over seventeen long years of struggling and waiting, not as near justice as when the Commission issued its circular of November, 1888.

The nominal ownership of several of the respondent railroads has changed several times since then, and this fact is claimed as their legal release from all liability. A railroad can apparently destroy a shipper's business, then change its name, reorganize or cancel leases, and escape all responsibility. This lawyer's snarl, coupled with the decision that the Interstate Commerce Commission had not presented this plainly unusual, destructive, and inexplainable advanced rate complained of as an "unreasonable and unjust" fact, so shown by the evidence taken before them, but had merely stated it as their opinion, were the main reasons, as understood by us as laymen or business men, why the United States circuit court decided in May, 1905, in favor of the railroads and against the Commission. The only business question involved, cleared of the fog made by railroad lawyers, being whether this destructive advance of 14 cents per barrel, made from a long-established rate of 52 cents to 66 cents, and an increase which the railroads themselves declared they did not want to make, was, as a matter of fact, an "unreasonable" rate, and could be so shown unmistakably to the United States court by the Commission.

This matter involved a very large amount of money and claims against other railroads besides the ones complained of, the shippers, having large, long-time contracts, continuing to ship at the prohibitive advance for some time thereafter, fully expecting, under the extraordinary circumstances and the notice of the Commission, that the old rates would be restored and the advance refunded. As was confidently expected, the Commission did, after a long delay, decide the rates unreasonable and awarded reparation; but the railroads again refused compliance with the Commission's views, and the shippers have received no relief to this time, though, as the records show, more than seventeen years have elapsed since this arbitrary railroad action.

The Interstate Commerce Commission has thus been powerless to relieve this shameful situation themselves or through the assistance of the United States courts. What equity is there in a "judicial review" delayed until the injured parties die or their business is destroyed long before relief comes, if ever? There is nothing complicated in these cases. The foregoing is not a prejudiced private view, but is a plain statement of untangled facts, easily verified from the public records. These shippers have been jammed in a disastrous wreck for more than seventeen years between the railroads and the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the most radical railroad advocate of noninterference with railroad rate making could not insist that the law as it now stands has given the survivors anything like a "fair chance" or a "square deal."

All of which is very respectfully submitted.

INDEPENDENT REFINERS' ASSOCIATION.
THEODORE B. WESTGATE, Secretary.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I should like to have the paper presented by the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] followed in the RECORD with the unanimous opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, delivered by Mr. Justice White on Monday last. I do not care to have it read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey requests that the opinion of Mr. Justice White referred to by him may be printed in the RECORD without reading. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

The opinion referred to is as follows:

[Supreme Court of the United States. Nos. 24 and 27.—October term, 1905. New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company, appellant, v. The Interstate Commerce Commission. The Interstate Commerce Commission, appellant, v. The Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company and the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company. Appeals from the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Virginia. February 19, 1906.]

Mr. Justice White delivered the opinion of the court.

Following an inquiry, begun in consequence of a complaint to it made, the Interstate Commerce Commission, through the Attorney-General of the United States, filed under the act to further regulate commerce (32 Stat., 847) in the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Virginia, this proceeding against the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company, a Virginia corporation, and the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company, a corporation of the State of Connecticut. In this opinion we shall hereafter respectively speak of the parties as the Commission, the Chesapeake and Ohio, and the New Haven. The petition averred that the Chesapeake and Ohio was engaged in the carriage of coal as interstate traffic between the Kanawha district of West Virginia and Newport News, Va., for delivery thence to the New Haven, in Connecticut, and charged that the traffic was being moved at less than the published rates, and in such a way as to produce a discrimination in favor of the New Haven road and against others, all in violation of the act to regulate commerce and the amendments thereto. Specifying the grounds of the complaint, it was alleged that in the spring of 1893 the Chesapeake and Ohio made a verbal agreement with the New Haven to sell to that road 60,000 tons of coal, to be carried from the Kanawha district to Newport News, and thence by water to Connecticut, for delivery to the buyer at $2.75 per ton, and that a considerable portion had already been delivered and the remainder was in process of delivery. It was averred that the price of the coal at the mines where the Chesapeake and Ohio bought it and the cost of transportation from Newport News to Connecticut would aggregate $2.47 per ton, thus leaving to the Chesapeake and Ohio only about 28 cents a ton for carrying the coal from the Kanawha district to Newport News, whilst the published tariff for like carriage from the same district was $1.45 per ton.

Referring to the developments before the Commission, and annexing as part the testimony taken on such hearing and the documents connected therewith, the petition further alleged that the Chesapeake and Ohio asserted that, although the total price which it received for the coal covered by the verbal agreement was less than the total outlay in delivering the coal, including its published rates, such fact did not amount to a departure from the published rates and was not a discrimination, for two reasons: First, because if such difference existed, it was a loss suffered by the Chesapeake and Ohio not from taking less than its published rates, but because it had received less as purchaser than the coal had cost; second, that even if it had not the lawful right thus to impute the payment of the price of the coal, the Chesapeake and Ohio had, in fact, received much more for the coal than the price in money agreed on, because at the time the verbal agreement to sell was made the New Haven had a claim exceeding $100,000 against the Chesapeake and Ohio arising from a previous written contract to deliver coal, which was to be extinguished by the completion of the delivery of the coal, and this caused that price largely to exceed the cost of the coal to the Chesapeake and Ohio, including its published rates. Averring that the prior contract was in itself void because it also embodied an agreement to take less than the published rates and was discriminating, it was charged that the New Haven had entered into both agreements with the Chesapeake and Ohio knowing that they were in violation of the interstate-commerce law. The prayer was that the Chesapeake and Ohio and the New Haven be made parties; that both roads be enjoined, the one from further executing the verbal agreement to deliver coal and the other from seeking to enforce it; that the Chesapeake and Ohio be enjoined from "accepting or receiving any rebate, concession, or discrimination in respect of the transportation of any property in interstate or foreign commerce carried by it" and be, moreover, enjoined from "doing anything whatever whereby coal or any other property shall, by any device whatever, be transported * * * at a less rate than named in the tariffs published and filed by such carrier, as is required by the act to regulate commerce, and acts amendatory thereof or supplementary thereto, or whereby any other advantage may be given or discrimination practiced," and that the New Haven road "be enjoined and restrained from accepting or receiving any rebate, concession, or discrimination in respect of the transportation of any property in interstate or foreign commerce carried by it."

A preliminary restraining order was issued conforming to the prayer of the petition. The Chesapeake and Ohio by its answer admitted that it had made, in the spring of 1903, a verbal agreement with the New Haven road for about 60,000 tons of Kanawha coal for the price alleged in the petition, to be transported by it to Newport News, and thence delivered by ocean transportation to the New Haven in Connecticut. It was admitted that the purchase price agreed to be paid was less than the market price of the coal plus the published rates and the cost of transportation and delivery from Newport News to Connecticut, but it was averred that this was only apparently the case, because the contract to sell included the discharge of a debt of about $100,000, arising from the previous written contract to which the petition referred. The validity of both the previous written contract and the later verbal agreement was averred. The right of the Chesapeake and Ohio to buy and sell coal, and to impute any loss on the sale of the coal to itself as dealer instead of to itself as a carrier, was averred. Both the original contract and the one of 1903 were averred to have been made in good faith, not with any intention to avoid the published rates, and it was charged that at about the time the original contract was made arrangements had been made by the railroad for a rate of transportation from Newport News to Connecticut which would have caused the contract price to be adequate to pay the market price of the coal and all other charges, including the published rates, but that, subsequently thereto, the persons with whom this contract for transportation was made had violated their agreement, and that by strikes the price of coal had advanced, and thereby the loss of $100,000 to the Chesapeake and Ohio was occasioned.

The New Haven road in its answer asserted its good faith in making both the original contract and the verbal agreement. It alleged that by the original contract it was a mere purchaser of coal from the Chesapeake and Ohio, and not a shipper over that road; that the coal bought was intended for its own use in the operation of its railroad; that it had no knowledge of the price which the Chesapeake and Ohio would be obliged to pay for the coal or the sum which it would cost that road to deliver it, and therefore had no knowledge that the total cost would not equal the market price of the coal, the cost of delivery, and the published rate of the Chesapeake and Ohio. It averred the validity of the agreement, the legality of the debt of $100,000 which resulted from it, and charged that, taking that debt into consideration, the sum which it paid the Chesapeake and Ohio for the coal under the 1903 verbal agreement largely exceeded the market price and the cost of delivery, including the published rates of the Chesapeake and Ohio. It denied that there was any departure from the public rates or any discrimination, asserted that at the time the original contract was made the price was sufficient to have enabled the Chesapeake and Ohio to perform the contract without losing anything either as a seller or as a carrier, and that if in execution of the contract a condition arose where a loss was suffered by the Chesapeake and Ohio in either capacity, it was caused by subsequent events which could not affect the validity of the contract when made, and especially denied that in any way, directly or indirectly, had it knowingly lent itself to any discrimination, or any taking by the Chesapeake and Ohio of less than its published rates.

The case was heard on the testimony taken in the proceeding before the Commission and the documents forming a part of the same and upon further documents and testimony stipulated by counsel.

For reasons to which we shall hereafter have occasion to advert, the court held that, considering both the original contract and the verbal agreement of 1903, there was no violation of the provisions of the second and sixth sections of the act to regulate commerce, forbidding the taking of less than the published rates. It, however, held that the contracts amounted to an undue discrimination and a violation of the third section of the act. The court hence permanently enjoined the Chesapeake and Ohio from discharging any obligation arising from the original contract of 1896 and from further executing or attempting to execute, in any manner whatever, directly or indirectly, the verbal agreement of 1903, and it permanently enjoined the New Haven from asserting or attempting to enforce any claim arising from the contract of 1896, or in any manner, directly or indirectly, attempting to enforce the verbal agreement of 1903. Thereafter the court denied a request made by the Commission, that the injunction be expanded so as in general terms to command the Chesapeake and Ohio perpetually to observe in the future its published rates.

The Chesapeake and Ohio and the New Haven appealed. The Commission also prosecuted a cross appeal because of the refusal of the court to grant its prayer to make the injunction against the Chesapeake and Ohio general in its nature.

It is apparent from the case as thus stated that, in order to decide the issues which arise, we may not confine our attention to the verbal agreement of 1903, the execution of which it was the immediate object of the proceeding to enjoin, but must consider the prior contract of 1896, since primarily the rights, if any, which arose under the verbal agreement are inextricably involved in and dependent upon the contract of 1896. In other words, the controversy as considered by the Commission on the inquiry by it conducted and as decided below, and as here presented, involves an analysis of all the dealings under both contracts and the legal rights, if any, which arose from them. We must, therefore, consider the subject in this aspect, and to do so we state at once the facts which are admitted or which are indisputably established, reserving such questions of fact as are in dispute for separate consideration when we approach the legal propositions which arise from the undisputed facts.

The Chesapeake and Ohio, chartered by the State of Virginia, operates a road which reaches both the New River and the Kanawha coal fields of West Virginia, and extends to Newport News. The New Haven, chartered by the State of Connecticut, operates a road principally situated in New England. On December 3, 1896, these two roads entered into a written contract, the one to sell and the other to buy between July 1, 1897, and July 1, 1902, not to exceed 2,000,000 gross tons of bituminous coal to be taken from the line of the Chesapeake and Ohio road, deliveries to be made not exceeding 400,000 tons per annum. The price agreed upon was $2.75 per gross ton, New Haven basis, settlement to be made monthly. The coal was to be delivered by the seller on the line of the New Haven. The contract is reproduced, as follows:

Contract made between the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company and the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company.

Said Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company, for the consideration hereinafter mentioned, hereby agrees to furnish to said railroad company not to exceed 2,000,000 gross tons of bituminous coal from its line in such quantities monthly as wanted from July 1, 1897, to July 1, 1902, without charge for demurrage. Deliveries to be made not exceeding 400,000 tons per annum.

And said Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company further agrees that all said bituminous coal shall be of the best quality, first class in every respect, and satisfactory to said railroad company, and said railway company has the right to terminate this contract at any time if said bituminous coal be of poor quality or if its delivery be unnecessarily delayed.

And said Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company further agrees to deliver all said bituminous coal to said railroad company in its bins at such ports upon its lines as required by the monthly requisitions of its purchasing agent.

In consideration of the faithful performance by the said Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company of all its agreements herein contained said railroad company agrees to pay for said bituminous coal at the rate of two and seventy-five one-hundredths dollars per gross ton, New Haven basis, settlement to be made monthly.

Said railway company has the right to cancel any and all portions of said quantity of bituminous coal remaining undelivered on July 1, 1902.

Witness the names of the parties hereto this the 3d day of December, 1896.

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO RAILWAY COMPANY,
By M. E. INGALLS, President.
THE NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN AND HARTFORD RAILROAD COMPANY,
By C. E. MELLEN, Second Vice-President.

For value received, I hereby guarantee that the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company shall not fail to deliver coal on account of strikes.

J. PIERPONT MORGAN.

The Chesapeake and Ohio, not in its own name but through others who really although not ostensibly acted for it, made a contract with operators in the New River district of West Virginia for the delivery to it of the coal to fulfill the contract which had been made with the New Haven. In consequence of failure of some of the operators to perform their part of the contract, changes were made at various times, which it is unnecessary to note. Deliveries of the coal were made to the New Haven as required up to the winter of 1900–1901, when, because of strikes and other difficulties, delivery ceased and the New Haven bought coal in the open market and presented to the Chesapeake and Ohio a bill for the increased price which it had paid, and the Chesapeake and Ohio paid $160,000 to cover such loss. Subsequently, in 1902, further strikes supervened and deliveries again ceased, at a time when about 60,000 tons remained yet to be delivered. The New Haven again presented a bill for damages amounting to $103,000. Thereupon the verbal agreement of 1903 was made, by which it was provided that the shortage of 60,000 tons upon the original contract might be discharged by delivery on the part of the Chesapeake and Ohio of that amount of coal from the Kanawha district at the contract price of $2.75, and when this delivery was consummated it was agreed that the Chesapeake and Ohio would be absolutely relieved from the payment of the damage claim just referred to.

At the time this verbal agreement was made the contract price was, leaving out of view the claim for damages, inadequate to pay the market price, as admitted by the pleadings, of the coal plus the published rates of the Chesapeake and Ohio to Newport News, and the charges thence to the point of delivery. To put itself in a position to carry out the agreement an individual who represented the Chesapeake and Ohio made contracts in his own name with operators in the Kanawha district to furnish the desired coal. Without stopping to state the particular methods of accounting by which the result was accomplished, it is indisputable that the Chesapeake and Ohio bore the loss arising from the difference between the contract price, the price of the coal at the mines, the published rate to Newport News, and the cost of transporting thence to the point of delivery.

Undoubtedly long prior to the making of the first contract the Chesapeake and Ohio, besides its business as a carrier, bought and sold coal. This business was carried on by the company from about 1874 up to the time of the making of the contract of 1896, as testified by the president who made that contract, as follows:

"The coal was handled by a separate and distinct department of the railway company, the mine operators delivering for an agreed price at the mines to the coal agent of the railway company all coal mined by them, the net result realized from the selling price of the coal representing the freight earned by the railway company."

And the same official testified that he made the contract of 1896 as a continuation of this system.

In 1895, however, the State of West Virginia passed "An act to prevent railroad companies from buying or selling coal or coke and to prevent discrimination." The first section of this act made it unlawful for any railroad corporation to engage directly or indirectly in the business of buying and selling coal or coke. In consequence of this act, prior to the making of the contract of 1896, the coal department of the railroad was abolished. And it was the existence of the West Virginia statute which caused the Chesapeake and Ohio, when it contracted with operators in West Virginia to procure as to both contracts the coal for delivery to the New Haven, to do so not in its own name but through another.

Before applying to these undisputed facts the legal question arising for decision, we must determine a question of fact as to which there is some dispute; that is, Was the price at which the Chesapeake and Ohio contracted in 1896 to sell the coal to the New Haven sufficient to pay the cost of the coal at the mines, as well as the expense of delivery, including the published freight rate? Without stopping to go into the evidence, we content ourselves with saying that we think the court below correctly held that the price was not adequate to accomplish these purposes, and that from the inception of delivery under the contract and during the whole period thereof, except for a brief time, caused by a lowering of the freight rates, the contract price was inadequate to net the railroad its proper legal tariff.

We are brought then to determine whether the contract made in 1896 for the 2,000,000 tons of coal was void because in conflict with the act to regulate commerce and its amendments. In approaching the consideration of the act to regulate commerce we, for the moment, put out of view the provisions of the West Virginia statute and its influence upon the validity of the contract made in West Virginia for the purpose of acquiring the coal which the Chesapeake and Ohio had obligated itself to deliver. We shall also assume, for the purpose of the inquiry, that the Chesapeake and Ohio, although not expressly authorized, was not prohibited by its Virginia charter from buying and selling and transporting the coal in which it dealt. The case, therefore, will be considered solely in the light of the operation and effect of the provisions of the act to regulate commerce, and we shall not direct our attention to expressly determining whether the assertion by a carrier of a right to deal in the products which it transports would not be so repugnant to the general duty resting on the carrier as to cause the exertion of the power to deal in the products which it transports to be unlawful, irrespective of statutory restrictions.

The question, therefore, to be decided is this: Has a carrier engaged in interstate commerce the power to contract to sell and transport in completion of the contract the commodity sold when the price stipulated in the contract does not pay the cost of purchase, the cost of delivery, and the published freight rates?

The previous decisions of this court concerning the interstate-commerce act do not afford much aid in determining this question. This is the case, because, although that act was adopted in 1887, and questions concerning the import of the act have been often here, such questions have not generally involved the operation and effect of the act concerning the command that published rates be adhered to, and the prohibitions against discrimination, favoritism, or rebates, but have mainly concerned the meaning of the act in other respects; that is, involved deciding whether powers asserted as to other subjects were vested by the act in the Interstate Commerce Commission.

There are several leading cases decided by the Commission, which are relied upon by the two railroads, directly relating to the question we have stated, but, as we shall have occasion hereafter to weigh their import, we shall not now pause to analyze and apply them.

It can not be challenged that the great purpose of the act to regulate commerce, whilst seeking to prevent unjust and unreasonable rates, was to secure equality of rates as to all and to destroy favoritism, these last being accomplished by requiring the publication of tariffs and by prohibiting secret departures from such tariffs, and forbidding rebates, preferences, and all other forms of undue discrimination. To this extent and for these purposes the statute was remedial and is, therefore, entitled to receive that interpretation which reasonably accomplishes the great public purpose which it was enacted to subserve. That a carrier engaged in interstate commerce becomes subject as to such commerce to the commands of the statute, and may not set its provisions at naught whatever otherwise may be its power when carrying on commerce not interstate in character, can not in reason be denied. Now, in view of the positive command of the second section of the act, that no departure from the published rate shall be made, "directly or indirectly," how can it in reason be held that a carrier may take itself from out the statute in every case by simply electing to be a dealer and transport a commodity in that character? For, of course, if a carrier has a right to disregard the published rates by resorting to a particular form of dealing, it must follow that there is no obligation on the part of a carrier to adhere to the rates, because doing so is merely voluntary.

The all-embracing prohibition against either directly or indirectly charging less than the published rates shows that the purpose of the statute was to make the prohibition applicable to every method of dealing by a carrier by which the forbidden result could be brought about. If the public purpose which the statute was intended to accomplish be borne in mind, its meaning becomes, if possible, clearer. What was that purpose? It was to compel the carrier as a public agent to give equal treatment to all. Now, if by the mere fact of purchasing and selling merchandise to be transported a carrier is endowed with the power of disregarding the published rate, it becomes apparent that the carrier possesses the right to treat the owners of like commodities by entirely different rules. That is to say, the existence of such a power in its essence would enable a carrier, if it chose to do so, to select the favored persons from whom he would buy and the favored persons to whom he would sell, thus giving such persons an advantage over every other, and leading to a monopolization in the hands of such persons of all the products as to which the carrier chose to deal. Indeed, the inevitable result of the possession of such a right by a carrier would be to enable it, if it chose to exercise the power, to concentrate in its own hands the products which were held for shipment along its line, and to make it, therefore, the sole purchaser thereof and the sole seller at the place where the products were to be marketed; in other words, to create an absolute monopoly. To illustrate: If a carrier may by becoming a dealer buy property for transportation to a market and eliminate the cost of transportation to such market, a faculty possessed by no other owner of the commodity, it must result that the carrier would be in a position where no other person could ship the commodity on equal terms with the carrier in its capacity of dealer. No other person owning the commodity being thus able to ship on equal terms, it would result that the owners of such commodity would not be able to ship, but would be compelled to sell to the carrier. And as by the departure from the tariff rates the person to whom the carrier might elect to sell would be able to buy at a price less than any other person could sell for, it would follow that such person so selected by the carrier would have a monopoly in the market to which the goods were transported. And that the result arising from an admission of the asserted power of the carrier as a dealer to disregard the published rates conduces immediately and not merely remotely to the production of the injurious results stated, is not only demonstrated by the very nature of things, but is established to be the case by the facts indisputably shown on this record. For here it is unquestioned that the Chesapeake and Ohio, as a result of its being a dealer, had become, long prior to the adoption of the interstate-commerce law, and continued to be thereafter, up to the passage of the West Virginia statute prohibiting a carrier from dealing in coal, virtually the sole purchaser and seller of all the coal produced along the line of its road.

That the result was not merely accidental, but was in effect engendered by the power of the carrier to deal and transport a commodity, is illustrated by the case of the Attorney-General v. The Great Northern Railway Company (29 Law Journal [N. S. Equity], 794). In that case Vice-Chancellor Kindersley was called upon to determine whether dealing in coal by the railway company was illegal, because incompatible with its duties as a public carrier and calculated to inflict an injury upon the public. In deciding that the act of Parliament granting the charter to operate the railway implied a prohibition against the company's engaging in any other business, the reason for the rule was thus expressed (p. 798):

"* * * These large companies, joint stock companies generally, for whatever purpose established, and more particularly railway companies, are armed with powers of raising and possessing large sums of money—large amounts of property—and if they were to apply that money, or that property, to purposes other than those for which they were constituted, they might very much injure the interests of the public in various ways."

Illustrating the danger to the public, as established by the case before him, the vice-chancellor said (p. 792):

"Here we find this company, having the traffic from the north of England, where the great coal fields are (at least some of the principal coal fields), supplying the country with coal, or capable of supplying it; this company buys the coal, which gives to the company an interest in checking, as much as possible, those who will not deal with them; and it is quite clear that it is possible, by the mode in which this company may—I will not say has—but by the mode in which this company may exercise such powers as either it has or assumes to have, this company may get into their hands the traffic—that is, the dealing in all the coal in the large districts supplying coal to the country. They have to a considerable extent done so, and there is no reason why it should not go on progressing. I observe that in the eight (?) years from 1852 to 1857, inclusive, the amount of their coal business has increased from 73,000 tons to 794,000 tons; and there is no reason, as the affidavits show, why they should not—there is great danger that they may—get into their hands the entire business in the coal of all that district of the country. If they can do so with regard to coal, what is to prevent there doing it with every species of agricultural produce all along the line? Why should they not become purchasers of corn, of all kinds of beasts, and of sheep, and every species of agricultural produce, and become great dealers in the supply of edibles to the markets of London; and why not every other species of commodity that is produced in every part of the country from which or to which their railway runs? I do not know where it is to stop, if the argument on the part of the company is to prevail. There is, therefore, great detriment to the interests of the public, for this reason, taking merely the article of coal."

It is apparent that the construction of the statute which is now claimed by the carriers would, if adopted, not only destroy its entire remedial efficacy, but would cause the provisions of the statute to accentuate and multiply the very wrongs which it was enacted to prevent.

Without a statutory requirement as to publication of rates and the imposition of a duty to adhere to the rates as published, individual action of the shippers as between themselves and in their dealings with the carrier would have full play, and thereby every shipper would have the opportunity to procure such concessions as might result from favoritism or other causes. Interpreting the prohibitions of the statute as it is contended they should be, it would follow that every individual would be bound by the published tariff, and the carrier alone would be free to disregard it. Thus the statute, while subjecting the public to the prohibitions, would exempt the carrier and would thereby enormously increase the opportunities of the latter to do the wrongs which the statute was enacted to prevent.

And the considerations previously stated serve also to demonstrate that the prohibitions of the act to regulate commerce concerning "undue or unreasonable preference or advantage," "undue or unreasonable prejudice or disadvantage," and "unjust discrimination" are in conflict with the asserted right of a carrier to become a dealer in commodities which it transports, and as such dealer to sell at a price less than the cost and the published rates. Certain also is it, when the reasons previously stated are applied to those prohibitions of the statute, the possession of the power by a carrier to deal in merchandise and to sell and transport at less than prohibited rates would not only destroy the remedy intended to be afforded by the provisions in question, but would cause the statute to fructify the growth of the wrongs which it was intended to extirpate. In a general sense the considerations which we have previously stated, moreover, dispose of all the contentions urged at bar to establish the right of the carrier to become a dealer under the circumstances stated. Even although it may give rise to some repetition, we more particularly notice the various contentions.

(a) It is said that when a carrier sells an article which it has purchased and transports that article for delivery it is both a dealer and a carrier. When, therefore, the price received for the commodity is adequate to pay the published freight rate and something over, the command of the statute as to adherence to the published rates is complied with, because the price will be imputed to the freight rate, and the loss, if any, attributed to the company in its capacity as dealer and not as a carrier. This simply asserts the proposition which we have disposed of—that a carrier possesses the power, by the form in which he deals, to render the prohibitions of the act ineffective, since it implies the right of a carrier to shut off inquiry as to the real result of a particular transaction on the published rates, and thereby to obtain the power of disregarding the prohibitions of the statute.

(b) It is said that, as in the case in hand, it is shown that there was no intention on the part of the carrier in making the sale of the coal to violate the prohibitions of the statute, and, on the contrary, as the proof shows an arrangement made by the carrier for transporting the coal from Newport News to Connecticut, which, if it had been carried out, would have provided for the full published rate, therefore an honest contract made by the carrier should not be stricken down because of things over which the carrier had no control. The proposition involves both an unfounded assumption of fact and an unwarranted implication of law. It is true the court below found that the proof did not justify the inference that the Chesapeake and Ohio had, in 1896, made the contract to sell the coal to the New Haven with the purpose of avoiding a compliance with the published rates. But in this conclusion of fact we can not agree. Whilst it may be that the proof establishes that the contract for the sale of coal was not made as a mere device for avoiding the operation of the statute, we think the proof leaves no doubt that, in making the contract in question, the Chesapeake and Ohio was wholly indifferent to and did not concern itself with the prohibitions of the statute, of which, of course, it must be assumed to have had full knowledge. As we have seen, the president of the Chesapeake and Ohio, by whom the corporation was represented in making the contract, expressly testified that from the beginning that corporation had pursued the policy of acquiring all the coal mined on its line and sold it, relying upon the net result of such sales for its freight compensation, and that the particular contract was made in continuation of that policy. We find it impossible to conclude, from the proof, that the Chesapeake and Ohio could have made a contract for so large an amount of coal, to be delivered over so long a period, without taking into view the existing prices and the cost necessarily to be occasioned by the delivery of the coal, if the full published freight rates were to be realized. Indeed, the proof leaves no doubt upon our minds that, in making the contract, the Chesapeake and Ohio sought to accomplish results which it deemed beneficial by means which it considered effectual, even although resort to such means was prohibited by the interstate-commerce act.

In other words, we think it is established beyond doubt that, desiring to stimulate the production of coal along its line and thereby, as it conceived, to increase the carriage of that commodity and to benefit the railroad and those living along its line by the reflex prosperity which it was deemed would arise from giving a stimulus to an industry tributary to the railroad, the Chesapeake and Ohio bought and sold the coal without reference to whether the net result to it would realize its published rates. And it would seem that this means of stimulating the industry in question was resorted to instead of attempting to bring about the same result by a lowering of the published rates, because to have so done would have engendered disparity between coal rates and the tariff on all the other articles contained in the same classification, and would besides have caused other and competing roads to make a similar reduction on the published rates, and thereby would have frustrated the very advantage to itself and those along its lines which the Chesapeake and Ohio deemed it was bringing about by the method pursued. That is to say, we think it is shown that the mode of dealing adopted was simply the result of a disregard by the Chesapeake and Ohio of the economic conceptions upon which the interstate-commerce law rests and a substitution in their stead of the conceptions of the Chesapeake and Ohio as to what was best for itself and for the public. Further, as the prohibition of the interstate-commerce act is ever operative, even if the facts established that at the particular time the contract was made, considering the then cost of coal and other proper items, the net published tariff of rates would have been realized by the Chesapeake and Ohio from the contract, which is not the case, it is apparent that the deliveries under the contract came under the prohibition of the statute whenever for any cause, such as the enhanced cost of the coal at the mines, an increase in the cost of the ocean carriage, etc., the gross sum realized was not sufficient to net the Chesapeake and Ohio its published tariff of rates. This must be the case in order to give vitality to the prohibitions of the interstate-commerce act against the acceptance at any time by a carrier of less than its published rates. We say this because we think it is obvious that such prohibitions would be rendered wholly ineffective by deciding that a carrier may avoid those prohibitions by making a contract for the sale of a commodity stipulating for the payment of a fixed price in the future, and thereby acquiring the power during the life of the contract to continue to execute it, although a violation of the act to regulate commerce might arise from doing so. Besides, all the contentions just noticed proceed upon the mistaken legal conception that the application of the statutory prohibitions depend not upon whether the effect of the acts done is to violate those prohibitions, but upon whether the carrier intended to violate the statute.

(c) It is urged that if the requirement of the act to regulate commerce as to the maintenance of published rates and the prohibitions of that act against undue preferences and discriminations be applied to a carrier when engaged in buying and selling a commodity which it transports, the substantial effect will be to prohibit the carrier from becoming a dealer when no such prohibition is expressed in the act to regulate commerce, and hence a prohibition will be implied which should only result from express action by Congress. Granting the premise, the deduction is unfounded. Because no express prohibition against a carrier who engages in interstate commerce becoming a dealer in commodities moving in such commerce is found in the act, it does not follow that the provisions which are expressed in that act should not be applied and be given their lawful effect. Even, therefore, if the result of applying the prohibitions as we have interpreted them will be practically to render it difficult, if not impossible, for a carrier to deal in commodities, this affords no ground for relieving us of the plain duty of enforcing the provisions of the statute as they exist. This conclusion follows, since the power of Congress to subject every carrier engaging in interstate commerce to the regulations which it has adopted is undoubted.

But it is in effect said, conceding this to be true as an original question, the prohibitions of the act ought not now to be interpreted as applying to a carrier who is a dealer in commodities, because of an administrative construction long since given to the act by the Interstate Commerce Commission, the body primarily charged with its enforcement, and which has become a rule of property affecting vast interests which should not be judicially departed from, especially as such construction, it is asserted, has been impliedly sanctioned by Congress by frequently amending the act without changing it in this particular.

Passing, for the present, the legal conclusion, let us first ascertain whether the premise itself is well founded. The two rulings of the Interstate Commerce Commission upon which the premise is based are Haddock v. Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company (4 I. C. C. Rep., 296; 3 Inters. Com. Rep., 302) and Coxe Brothers & Co. v. Lehigh Valley Railroad Company (4 I. C. C. Rep., 535; 3 Inters. Com. Rep., 460), decided respectively in 1890 and 1891.

Without going into detail, we content ourselves with saying that in both of the cases complaints were made to the Interstate Commerce Commission concerning the defendant railroads, and it was charged that whilst acting as common carriers they were dealing in coal, and as a result violating the prohibition of the interstate-commerce act as to rates and undue preferences and discriminations. It was shown in both cases that the carriers prior to the adoption of the interstate-commerce act were authorized by their charters or legislative authority to carry on both the business of mining and selling the coal so mined and transporting the same to market. Indeed it was found in both cases that the functions of producing and transporting as authorized were so interblended that it was impossible to separate one from the other. Whilst it is true that in both of the cases it was also shown that the carriers bought, sold, and transported some coal which was not produced in the mines which they owned, this fact was evidently treated, in view of the other circumstances of the case, as of minor importance, since the commingled powers of producing, selling, and transporting were alone made the basis of the conclusion reached by the Commission as to the character of relief which could be afforded. Solely in view of the lawful power of the carriers to mine, sell, and transport existing before the passage of the act to regulate commerce, the Commission decided that its authority, under that statute and under the circumstances of the case, was confined to compelling the exaction of rates which were just and reasonable. The fact that the rulings in the two cases just referred to were solely placed upon the peculiar powers of the defendant corporations possessed by them prior to the passage of the interstate-commerce act was pointed out by the Commission in Grain Rates of Chicago Great Western Rwy. Co., (7 I. C. C. Rep., 33). In that case, in deciding that the defendant carrier was without power to purchase grain for the purpose of securing the right to transport it, and thus evade the law which would have applied to its transportation had it been owned by any other party, the Commission, in distinguishing the case before it from the Haddock and Coxe cases, said (p. 38):

"Those cases are in no respect similar to this. In both the common carrier was also the owner of extensive coal fields, and, indeed, it had become a common carrier largely for the purpose of transporting the product of those mines to market. This state of things existed before the passage of the act, and had no reference to the act. Unless the carrier was permitted to transport its coal, the result would be in effect the confiscation of its property, and to order it to charge itself with a particular rate would merely result in a matter of bookkeeping. Under these circumstances it was held that the only remedy was to inquire whether the rate charged the complainant was a reasonable one."

Now, without at all intimating that as an original question we would concur in the view expressed in the case last cited, that to have applied the act to regulate commerce, under proper rules and regulations for the segregation of the business of producing, selling, and transporting as presented in the Haddock and Coxe cases, would have been confiscatory, and without reviewing the rulings made by the Interstate Commerce Commission in those cases and adhered to by that body during the many years which have followed those decisions, we concede that the interpretation given by the Commission in those cases to the act to regulate commerce is now binding, and as restricted to the precise conditions which were passed on in the cases referred to, must be applied to all strictly identical cases in the future, at least until Congress has legislated on the subject. We make this concession because we think we are constrained to so do, in consequence of the familiar rule that a construction made by the body charged with the enforcement of a statute, which construction has long obtained in practical execution, and has been impliedly sanctioned by the reenactment of the statute without alteration in the particulars construed, when not plainly erroneous, must be treated as read into the statute. Especially do we think this rule applicable to the case in hand, because of the nature and extent of the authority conferred on the Commission from the beginning concerning the prohibitions of the act as to rebates, favoritism, and discrimination of all kinds, and particularly in view of the repeated declarations of the court that an exertion of power by the Commission concerning such matters was entitled to great weight and was not lightly to be interfered with. The concessions thus made, however, are wholly irrelevant to the case before us. This follows, since the Chesapeake and Ohio was, neither by its charter nor by legislative grant existing at the time of the adoption of the act to regulate commerce, possessed of the commingled attributes of carrier and producer, which was the controlling consideration in the decisions made in the Haddock and Coxe cases.

Concluding, therefore, that both the contracts made by the Chesapeake and Ohio with the New Haven were contrary to public policy and void because in conflict with the prohibitions of the act to regulate commerce, it obviously follows that such contracts were not susceptible of being enforced by the New Haven, and afforded no legal basis for a claim of the New Haven against the Chesapeake and Ohio, and therefore the court below was correct in so deciding.

This leaves only for consideration the question raised by the cross appeal of the Interstate Commerce Commission. That proposition is thus stated in the first of the assignments of error filed on behalf of the Commission:

"That the circuit court of the United States for the western district of Virginia, after finding that the claim of the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company against the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company for $103,910.69, asserted as damages arising from a partial nonperformance by said railway company of a contract of December 3, 1896, set out in the record, is, as to the whole of said claim and interest thereon, an illegal and unenforceable claim, and after finding that the verbal agreement between said companies, made in April, 1903, and set out in said record, whereby said railway company undertook to furnish to said railroad company 59,966 tons of coal, to be transported from West Virginia to Newport News, Va., over the lines of said railway company, and thence transported by vessels to certain New England ports, said coal to be delivered at said ports at the price of $2.75 per ton, New Haven basis, to be an invalid and illegal agreement; that said court merely enjoined and restrained the said Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company, its officers, agents, and employees, from in any manner, direct or indirect, executing or performing, or attempting to execute or perform, either said contract of December 3, 1896, or said agreement of April, 1903, and from in any manner discharging or satisfying any obligation or seeming obligation arising from said agreements or either of them, or arising from any arrangement or agreement made in lieu of said agreements, or either of them; whereas said court should have further enjoined and restrained the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company from giving to said railroad company, or to any other person, firm, or company, any undue or unreasonable advantage or preference, and should further have restrained and enjoined the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company from transporting coal from one State to or through any other State for the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company, or for any firm, person, or company, at a less rate than the duly established freight rate of the said railway company in force at the time, and from further failing to observe its published tariffs, or from giving to the said New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company, or to any person, firm, or company, in any manner whatsoever, any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage, and said decree, entered by the court on the 19th day of February, 1904, in addition to the provisions thereof, should have enjoined and restrained the New York, New Haven and Hartford Railroad Company and its officers and agents from seeking or accepting, in any manner, any direct or indirect rebate of the duly established freight rates of the Chesapeake and Ohio Railway Company on any interstate commerce, and from seeking or accepting in any manner from said railway company any undue or unreasonable preference or advantage."

The contention, therefore, is that whenever a carrier has been adjudged to have violated the act to regulate commerce in any particular it is the duty of the court not only to enjoin the carrier from further like violations of the act, but to command it in general terms not to violate the act in the future in any particular. In other words, the proposition is that by the effect of a judgment against a carrier concerning a specific violation of the act the carrier ceases to be under the protection of the law of the land, and must thereafter conduct all its business under the jeopardy of punishment for contempt for violating a general injunction. To state the proposition is, we think, to answer it. (Swift & Co. v. United States, 196 U. S., 375.) The contention that the cited case is inapposite because it did not concern the act to regulate commerce, but involved a violation of the antitrust act, we think is also answered by the mere statement of the proposition. The requirement of the act to regulate commerce that a court shall enforce an observance of the statute against a carrier who has been adjudged to have violated its provisions in no way gives countenance to the assumption that Congress intended that a court should issue an injunction of such a general character as would be violative of the most elementary principles of justice. The injunction which was granted in the case of In re Debs (154 U. S., 564) was not open to such an objection, as its terms were no broader than the conspiracy which it was the purpose of the proceeding to restrain. To accede to the doctrine relied upon would compel us, under the guise of protecting freedom of commerce, to announce a rule which would be destructive of the fundamental liberties of the citizen.

As the court below did not decide that the second and sixth sections of the act, relating to the maintenance of rates, had been violated, the injunction by it issued was not made as directly responsive to the commands of the statute on that subject as we think it should have been. We therefore conclude that the injunction below should be modified and enlarged by perpetually enjoining the Chesapeake and Ohio from taking less than the rates fixed in its published tariff of freight rates by means of dealing in the purchase and sale of coal. And as thus modified the decree below is affirmed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLAPP, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2789) for the establishment of town sites and for the sale of lots within the common lands of the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indians in Oklahoma, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 431) to open for settlement 505,000 acres of land in the Kiowa, Comanche, and Apache Indian reservations, in Oklahoma Territory, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. TALIAFERRO, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1141) for the relief of Wilbur F. McCue, reported adversely thereon, and moved that it be indefinitely postponed; which was agreed to.

Mr. DILLINGHAM, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 13538) to incorporate The Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. DRYDEN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1792) to provide for the erection of a public building at Baker City, in the State of Oregon, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the bill (S. 39) for the erection of an equestrian statue of Maj. Gen. John Stark, in the city of Manchester, N. H., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4370) to appropriate the sum of $40,000 to the Cape Cod Pilgrims' Memorial Association, to be used in erecting at Provincetown, Mass., a suitable memorial of the landing of the Pilgrims, reported it with an amendment to the title, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 333) in regard to a monumental column to commemorate the battle of Princeton, and appropriating $30,000 therefor, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10853) to prohibit gambling in the Territories, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Territories; which was agreed to.

Mr. HEYBURN, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 580) to establish a Government building at the town of Moscow, Idaho, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. WETMORE, from the Committee on the Library, to whom were referred the following bills and joint resolution, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 38) for the erection of a statue to the memory of Gen. James Miller at Peterboro, N. H.;

A bill (S. 685) for the erection of a monument to the memory of John Paul Jones; and

A joint resolution (S. R. 1) for the erection of a monument to the memory of Dorothea Lynde Dix.

Mr. WETMORE, from the Committee on the Library, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. R. 20) directing the selection of a site for the erection of a bronze statue in Washington, D. C., in honor of the late Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 684)) providing for the erection of a public building in the city of Quincy, Mass., reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. ELKINS, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 6009) to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. STONE, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1694) for the erection of a public building at Carthage, Mo., reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4130) to authorize the Capital City Improvement Company, of Helena, Mont., to construct a dam across the Missouri River, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. TELLER, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 10697) providing for the issuance of patents for lands allotted to Indians under the Moses agreement of July 7, 1883, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2701) providing for the issuance of patents for lands allotted to Indians under the Moses agreement of July 7, 1883, submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them each with an amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 3294) to provide for the erection of a public building at Alton, Ill.; and

A bill (S. 1831) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building at Eureka, Cal.

Mr. SCOTT, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2264) to provide for enlarging the public building at Roanoke, Va., in order to accommodate the United States courts, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. HANSBROUGH, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4434) ceding a parcel or strip of land to the city of Hot Springs, Ark., for use as a public street, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

He also, from the Committee on the Library, to whom were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment, and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 111) to aid in the erection of a monument or memorial at Point Pleasant, W. Va., to commemorate the battle of the Revolution fought at that point between the colonial troops and Indians October 10, 1774; and

A bill (S. 1032) to aid in the erection of a statue of Commodore John D. Sloat, United States Navy, at Monterey, Cal.

Mr. PERKINS, from the Committee on Fisheries, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1459) to encourage private salmon hatcheries in Alaska, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4128) permitting the building of a dam across the Red Lake River at or near the junction of Black River with said Red Lake River in Red Lake County, Minn., reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. MILLARD, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1683) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon in the city of Kearney, State of Nebraska, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CULBERSON, from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1878) to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a public building thereon in the city of Provo, State of Utah, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4339) to amend section 4502 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, relating to bonds and oaths of shipping commissioners, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon.

FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES OF INDIANS.

Mr CLAPP. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 5976) to provide for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory, and for other purposes, to report it with amendments.

I desire to state that under existing law the tribal relations of the Five Civilized Tribes in the Indian Territory will terminate a week from Saturday. Unless provision is made between now and then for the schools, they will all have to be closed; and in addition to that, the question of the disposition of their property will be very much involved in doubt and uncertainty as to its legal status. On behalf of the committee, therefore, I ask the Senate to allow this bill to be brought up for consideration and action to-morrow.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. BAILEY. Before that order is made, Mr. President, I wish to state that I desire to examine that bill. I shall object to the order being made until I can examine it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas objects.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator from Minnesota will withdraw his request until to-morrow morning, and then move to proceed to the consideration of the bill, I do not know that I shall then object. I simply want to examine it.

Mr. CLAPP. Then I give notice that I shall renew the request to-morrow morning.

Mr. BAILEY. It is more than probable that I may then readily assent to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be placed on the Calendar.

CUMBERLAND RIVER BRIDGE AT CARTHAGE, TENN.

Mr. CLAY. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4482) to amend an act entitled "An act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Cumberland River at or near Carthage, Tenn.," to report it without amendment.

Mr. FRAZIER. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] from the Committee on Commerce, being Senate bill 4482.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes that the act named be so amended as to extend the time for commencing the construction of the bridge to one year and for its completion to three years from the date of the approval of the proposed act.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

HEARINGS BEFORE COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. KEAN, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred the resolution submitted by Mr. CLARK of Wyoming on the 21st instant, reported it favorably without amendment; and the resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time as may be necessary to report such hearings and proceedings as may be had before such committee, or its subcommittees, in connection with matters pending before it, and to have the same printed for its use, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

SCHOOL LAND AT ST. AUGUSTINE, FLA.

Mr. HANSBROUGH. Yesterday I submitted a report from the Committee on Public Lands, to accompany the bill (S. 1726) making provision for conveying in fee the piece or strip of ground in St. Augustine, Fla., known as "The Lines," for school purposes. On an examination of the report as printed I find quite a serious error. I ask that that report may be withdrawn and that the report I send to the desk may be substituted in place thereof.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. TELLER introduced a bill (S. 4626) granting an increase of pension to George H. Root; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4627) granting an increase of pension to Jerry C. Bliss; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WARREN introduced a bill (S. 4628) providing that the State of Wyoming be permitted to relinquish to the United States certain lands heretofore selected and to select other lands from the public domain in lieu thereof; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4629) granting an increase of pension to Mary Jane Miller; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. ALGER introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 4630) granting a pension to Joseph Barton;

A bill (S. 4631) granting an increase of pension to Harry S. Lee; and

A bill (S. 4632) granting a pension to Mary Talbott.

Mr. HEYBURN introduced a bill (S. 4633) authorizing Government assistance in the development and encouragement of ramie-fiber silk and flax preparation and manufacture, and their production and profitable home market in the United States, under the supervision of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

He also introduced a bill (S. 4634) granting an increase of pension to Charles Wescott; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. KITTREDGE introduced a bill (S. 4635) to approve certain final proofs in the Chamberlain land district, South Dakota; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 4636) granting an increase of pension to Henry R. Pease; and

A bill (S. 4637) granting an increase of pension to Frederick Zimmerman.

Mr. WETMORE introduced a bill (S. 4638) granting an increase of pension to James F. McKenna; which was read twice by its title, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. McLAURIN introduced a bill (S. 4639) for the relief of the estate of David R. Hubbard, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. FRAZIER introduced a bill (S. 4640) for the relief of Joseph B. Johnson; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. LONG introduced a bill (S. 4641) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Fisheries.

Mr. BURKETT introduced a bill (S. 4642) to apply a portion of the proceeds of the public lands to the State normal schools of the United States for the advancement of instruction in agriculture and manual training; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

He also introduced the following bills; which were severally read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (S. 4643) granting an increase of pension to Druzilla Gilmore;

A bill (S. 4644) granting an increase of pension to Carah Van Matre;

A bill (S. 4645) granting an increase of pension to Samuel L. Davis; and

A bill (S. 4646) granting an increase of pension to Ruth E. Keefer.

Mr. BACON introduced a bill (S. 4647) for the relief of the estate of W. J. Langston, deceased; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. ELKINS introduced a bill (S. 4648) granting a pension to S. S. Lockney; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

REGULATION OF INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to supplement and amend the act to regulate commerce, which I ask may be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, but, before sending the bill to the desk, I ask for unanimous consent to say a word in explanation of my reasons for offering this bill at so late a date.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request made by the Senator from Pennsylvania? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Pennsylvania will proceed.

Mr. KNOX. Mr. President, it has been very generally reported and it is the fact that I have recently, upon request of different persons interested in the rate regulation measures now pending before the Senate, submitted my views as to a provision which I deem essential to the certain constitutionality of the bill passed by the House of Representatives. I presented my views by taking out of the bill which I now offer section 5, and that section can not be thoroughly understood independent of its context. It is not my expectation that the bill which I now introduce will receive any further consideration from the committee than they may choose to give it as throwing light upon a provision for review in the courts of the action of the Commission, and if it is of any assistance in that direction I shall be more than satisfied.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Pennsylvania introduces a bill; which will be read by its title, and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the bill may be read in full.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Rhode Island asks that the bill be read in full. The Secretary will read as requested.

The bill (S. 4649) to supplement and amend the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, was read the first time by its title, and the second time at length, as follows:

A bill (S. 4649) to supplement and amend the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887.

Be it enacted etc., That the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate commerce," approved February 4, 1887, and of the acts amendatory thereof or supplemental thereto, and the provisions of this act shall extend to all common carriers engaged in commerce to which the regulative power of Congress extends under the Constitution of the United States, by the transportation of persons or property wholly by railroad or by the transportation of persons or property partly by railroad and partly by water when both are used for a continuous carriage or shipment. Said provisions shall also extend to all the facilities and instrumentalities connected therewith to which the regulative power of Congress extends, whether owned or provided by the carrier or not.

SEC. 2. That all charges made for any services rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of persons or property as aforesaid, or in connection therewith, or for the receiving, delivering, storage, or handling of such property, and all charges for expenses incurred in connection with the receipt, transit, or delivery thereof, shall be just and reasonable; and all practices, arrangements, regulations, and agreements affecting the charges for transportation of property, or the incidents thereto, whether the same relate to the receipt, transfer, transit, preservation, or delivery of property, or services rendered or expenses incurred in connection with the receipt, transfer, transit, preservation, or delivery thereof, shall be just and reasonable; and every unjust or unreasonable charge, practice, arrangement, regulation, or discrimination in relation to any of the matters aforesaid is hereby prohibited and declared to be unlawful.

SEC. 3. That any person, firm, corporation, or any representative association, mercantile, agricultural, or municipal society, or any body politic or municipal organization, complaining of anything done or omitted to be done in violation of the provisions of this act, or the acts named in section 1 of this act by any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act, either by said carrier alone or in connection with some other carrier, corporation, or person using, owning, or controlling any instrumentality or facility of commerce subject to the provisions of this act, may apply to the Interstate Commerce Commission by petition stating concisely the facts in regard to the matter complained of, and thereupon the Commission shall forward to such common carrier and others complained of a copy of the petition with direction to answer the same in writing within a reasonable time, to be specified by the Commission.

SEC. 4. That whenever, after full hearing upon such complaint, the said Commission shall determine that any existing rate or rates or practice whatsoever affecting the same, or any regulation or practice whatsoever as aforesaid, relating to any of the aforesaid services or transportation or incidents thereto, to be unjust, unreasonable, or unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential or prejudicial, or otherwise in violation of any of the provisions of this act or the acts named in section 1 of this act, it shall be the duty of the Commission to declare and order what, in its judgment, will be a just, reasonable, and fairly remunerative rate or rates, charge or charges, practice or regulation to be charged, imposed, or followed in place of the rate or rates, charge or charges, regulation or practice declared by it to be unjust, unreasonable, unjustly discriminatory, or unduly preferential under the provisions of any act referred to in section 1 hereof: Provided, That when the Commission shall order a rate reduced such reduced rate shall be the maximum to be observed by the carrier, and when the Commission shall order a practice to be changed its order shall be observed by the carrier.

When necessary to give effect to any provision of this act, the Commission may also, after hearing on a complaint, establish through routes to and from points between which through routes are not maintained by the lines complained of, either by said lines or in conjunction with some other line, and joint rates as the maximum to be charged and prescribe the division of such rates.

SEC. 5. That the orders of the Commission, except orders for the payment of money, shall take effect within such reasonable time as shall be prescribed by the Commission and shall continue for such period of time, not exceeding two years, as shall be prescribed in the order of the Commission, unless sooner set aside by the Commission or suspended or set aside by order of a court in a suit to test the lawfulness of said order; but any carrier, person, or corporation party to the proceedings affected by the decision of the Commission as to the rate or practice covered by the complaint, or by its order prescribing a different rate or practice, and alleging either or both to be a violation of its or his rights may institute proceedings against the complainant, and the Interstate Commerce Commission in the circuit court of the United States for the district in which any portion of the line of the carrier or carriers that were parties to the complaint may be located, sitting as a court of equity, to have such questions determined, but in no other way shall the lawfulness of such order be questioned, and in all such proceedings the court shall have power to make orders to secure the appearance of parties from any part of the United States, and the existing laws relative to evidence and to proceedings under the acts to regulate commerce shall be applicable: Provided, however, That no order of the Commission reducing a rate shall be set aside or suspended by an interlocutory decree of the court without requiring a deposit of the excess charge or sufficient bond to secure to the parties entitled thereto the repayment, if the Commission's order is sustained, of all moneys received by the carrier in excess of the rate fixed by the Commission, and the court shall determine in such interlocutory decree what practices shall be pursued by the parties pending the litigation in order to make this right of repayment certain and effective.

SEC. 6. That the defense in all such proceedings shall be undertaken by the United States district attorney for the district wherein the action is brought, under the direction of the Attorney-General of the United States, and the costs and expenses of such defense shall be paid out of the appropriation for the expenses of the courts of the United States.

SEC. 7. That when the rates substituted by the Commission, as hereinbefore provided, shall be a joint rate, and the carriers, parties thereto, fail to agree upon the apportionment thereof among themselves within twenty days after notice of such order, the Commission shall issue a supplemental order declaring the portion of such joint rate to be received by each carrier party thereto, which shall take effect as part of the original order and be subject to review by the courts of the United States in the manner hereinbefore provided for the review of original orders of the Commission.

SEC. 8. That if any carrier, person, or corporation bound by any order of the Commission provided for in this act shall, at any time while such order is in effect, refuse or neglect to obey the same, it or he shall be subject to a penalty of $5,000 for each day of the continuance of such refusal or neglect, which, together with costs of suit, shall be recoverable by the United States in an action of debt in the proper circuit court of the United States; and in addition thereto the Commission may apply by petition to the circuit court of the United States for the district in which such carrier has its principal office, or for any district in which any portion of the line of such carrier may be located, to enforce obedience to its order by writ of mandamus, injunction, or other appropriate process.

SEC. 9. That in all proceedings arising under this act in which the United States or the Interstate Commerce Commission is a party an appeal from the final decree of the circuit court shall lie only to the Supreme Court and must be taken within thirty days from the entry thereof. No appeal shall operate as a stay or supersedeas of the decree appealed from.

SEC. 10. That where any order made by the Commission shall involve the rate on traffic passing in part over the railroad or lines of any railroad company operating in any foreign country, and passing in part over lines of railroad companies operating in the United States, or shall involve the usages of such foreign railroad with respect to such traffic, then, in case such order shall not be observed, it shall be lawful for the Commission or the court having jurisdiction, in addition to the other remedies herein provided for, to enforce the order against the traffic so passing in part through a foreign country and in part through the United States by suspension of the movement thereof within the United States, save upon the condition that the terms of the order shall be complied with.

SEC. 11. To carry out and give effect to the provisions of this act and the acts mentioned in the first section of this act, or acts which the Interstate Commerce Commission is required to execute or enforce, the Commission is hereby authorized to employ special agents or examiners, who, acting under its directions, shall have power to administer oaths, examine witnesses, and receive evidence.

SEC. 12. The powers conferred upon the Interstate Commerce Commission by this act are additional to those it now possesses.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

AMENDMENT TO AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ELKINS submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $100,000 for the purchase of suitable ground in the District of Columbia and the erection thereon of a building to be used by the Forest Service as a laboratory for experiments in the seasoning and preservative treatment of construction and other timbers, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the agricultural appropriation bill; which was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed.

COAL LANDS IN BATAN, PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. LODGE. In accordance with the notice I gave the other day, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 12864) to provide for the purchase of certain coal claims in the island of Batan, in the Philippine Islands.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to purchase the coal claims owned by Messrs. Munoz and Villanueva, lying on the island of Batan, Philippine Islands, and upon which the War Department now holds an option, and appropriates $50,000 for that purpose.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Before the bill is submitted to a vote, I should like to ask the Senator from Massachusetts what is the character of the island of Batan, and whether it is suited for a naval or coaling station. I should like also to have some information as to where it is located.

Mr. LODGE. The island of Batan lies off the extreme southeast coast of the island of Luzon. There is a large Government reservation upon it. Upon that island have been discovered coal measures, which have been examined during the past two years by the Government authorities. They are found to be very extensive, and the coal is better than the Japanese coal, and is available for transports, launches, tugs, the ice plant, and all Government work in the Philippine Islands, besides mercantile employment. It would not do for use by war ships except under stress, but can be used for all other purposes. The coal measures are very extensive, and are believed to be very valuable. It would reduce the cost of coal to the Government from $5 to $2 a ton. There is an ample harbor there for large ships.

There are certain Spanish titles to land lying directly across the water front of the Government land which extend down to the harbor. Those titles have been examined by the law officers of the United States and are found to be good. Those titles were acquired many years before we acquired the islands. The War Department has an option to purchase those islands, which option expires on the 1st of March. If we do not purchase them now, it will probably lead to a great increase, as the possession of those titles by those private holders practically cripples the use of these large extensive tracts belonging to the United States, which lie just in the rear.

The bill simply provides for the extinguishment of those titles. It was unanimously reported from the committee in the House. It passed the House without a roll call, on a division, by more than four to one. It is unanimously reported from the committee here. It seems to be undoubtedly necessary to protect and make available this property of the Government. The bill makes no provision for the use of the land, whether by leasing or sale, but simply puts the Government in a position where it can avail itself of the land. If the bill is not passed immediately, we shall probably have to pay more for the titles.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether he can give us the area and population of the island, approximately.

Mr. LODGE. It is a very small island indeed, lying, as I say, to the extreme southeast of Luzon. It is 5 by 10 miles in dimension. There is a very small population there. The only value is in the coal.

Mr. NEWLANDS. How far does it lie from Luzon?

Mr. WARREN. Four hundred and fifty miles from Manila.

Mr. LODGE. Four hundred and fifty miles from Manila, because it is on the other side of the island, off the extreme southeast coast.

Mr. NEWLANDS. How near is it to the coast of Luzon?

Mr. LODGE. I should think it is 10 miles.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Did I understand the Senator to say it has a good harbor?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; an excellent harbor.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Capable——

Mr. LODGE. Capable of taking vessels of any size, so that merchant vessels can coal there.

Mr. NEWLANDS. There is one further question I should like to ask the Senator, and that is whether this island lies on the way from San Francisco to Luzon—the way, of course, usually pursued by Army transports.

Mr. LODGE. It was stated that it would be possible for Army transports to coal there on their way to and from Manila.

Mr. NEWLANDS. May I ask whether the Senator has inquired at all as to the adaptability of this island as a naval base, a commercial base, and a coaling station; as a link in our commercial system, in case we should conclude to abandon the Philippine Islands?

Mr. LODGE. Well, Mr. President, the committee has not considered the island from the point of view of the ultimate disposition of the Philippines. It has only considered that here was a large Government property which would be of no use unless we could extinguish these claims, and it was obviously a good business proposition. The bill was introduced by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], who has been in the Philippines. It is strongly approved by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. DUBOIS], whom I do not see in his seat for the moment; and they have much greater knowledge of the local circumstances than I have. There has been no opposition to it that I am aware of.

Mr. BACON. I believe it is a fact that this is the first discovery of coal in those islands, is it not?

Mr. LODGE. Yes; and investigations, I will say to the Senator from Georgia, have been made most thoroughly by an officer of the Army, Lieutenant Wigmore, which occupied nearly a year.

Mr. BACON. There is none on the island of Luzon?

Mr. LODGE. No. This deposit is very valuable and very accessible, and can be used both for mercantile and governmental purposes.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Is it not a fact that there are large coal deposits on the island of Cebu?

Mr. LODGE. We are not so informed. Moreover, we do not own the island of Cebu, and we already own the coal measures on this island.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I do not intend to oppose the bill. On the contrary, I am in favor of it. But I wish to call the attention of the Senate to one proposition, and that is, that we will be called upon before long to determine a definite policy regarding the Philippine Islands, whether we shall continue to hold those islands as a matter of trust—a trust for civilization, a trust for the Filipino people, according to the declarations made at the time the treaty with Spain was ratified, according to the declarations of the Democratic party, according to the declarations of the leaders of the Republican party, including President Roosevelt himself—or whether we shall gradually drift, without knowing it, into the permanent occupancy and holding of those islands.

It seems to me to be absolutely essential that we should determine that within a very reasonable time, for I imagine that if we should dispose of those islands, as the resolutions passed at the time of the treaty was ratified declared, in the best interests of the Filipino people and in the best interests of the people of the United States, we would continue to hold a coaling station and a naval and commercial base somewhere in those islands, either one or more. It is of the highest importance that we should determine now what that naval base is to be, for in the near future we shall be called upon for appropriations approximating nearly $30,000,000 for the purpose of improving either the harbor for an entrepot in Subig Bay or at Cavite, near Manila. It would be well for us to consider whether this particular island, of small area, of small population, and possessed of a magnificent harbor, will not satisfy the demands of our Navy and of our commerce better than either Subig Bay or Manila Bay, and whether or not the fortifications and improvements which will have to be constructed in the near future should not be located upon this island, which, in addition to the advantage of a great harbor, has the advantage of large deposits of coal which will supply the needs of both our Navy and our merchant marine.

While I was in the Philippine Islands last summer I observed that the sentiment of the Army officers was gradually drifting in the direction of fortifying Cavite instead of Subig Bay. It is admitted in either case that the sum which will be expended will amount to at least $30,000,000, and I have heard it stated that the fortifications necessary to properly defend those islands and the improvements in harbors essential for our Navy and our merchant marine will approximate nearer $100,000,000.

The question is whether we shall pursue the policy of drifting, as we are doing now, or whether we shall take counsel among ourselves and determine now, regardless of the question of the future disposition of the islands, where this naval and commercial base shall be. Obviously the wise thing to do will be to locate this naval and commercial base where it will serve either purpose, where it will serve our purpose in case we conclude to permanently hold on to the islands, and where it will serve our purpose in case we conclude to turn over the islands to the Filipino people.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nevada yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. NEWLANDS. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. I merely wish to ask a favor of the Senator. It is nearly 2 o'clock, in which case the bill will fail. There is no objection to it. The Senator himself does not oppose it. If he will allow the bill to pass, then of course I shall be happy to yield the floor.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Do I understand that the bill can not be considered after 2 o'clock?

Mr. LODGE. At 2 o'clock the unfinished business comes up, and the bill can not be further considered.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I deemed this a very opportune time to call the attention of the Senate to this subject, and I do not know when another such opportunity will arise.

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator that I have another bill here, equally unopposed, to alter the system of accounts on the admission of cotton textiles into the Philippine Islands, and he can make his speech on that bill.

Mr. GALLINGER. And on the Philippine tariff bill.

Mr. LODGE. Then I have the Philippine tariff bill, coming along later, on which he will have an opportunity, I am afraid, to make a great many speeches.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I understand, of course, that it is very important that this bill should pass now, as I believe the option expires on the 1st of March.

Mr. LODGE. The option expires in a few days.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will detain the Senate but two or three minutes. I simply want to give point to what I have already said—namely, that it is important we should determine now where this naval base shall be, and we should determine where it is to be, so that it will serve either purpose—so it will serve our purpose in case we propose to leave the islands and to turn over the government to their own people, and so that it will serve our purpose if we propose to retain the islands.

Now, the difficulty about Cavite—and we are drifting into large appropriations at Cavite—is that if hereafter we conclude to leave the islands to the government of their own people we will then lose every dollar invested at Cavite, whereas if we invest the money either in Subig Bay or in the island of Batan, we can retain either Subig Bay or the island of Batan as a naval and commercial base.

Of course, Subig Bay has not the same advantages, except possibly in location, that the island of Batan has, for the advantage of our holding an island that is entirely cut off from the mainland, limited in area and with a limited population, is obvious. If we are to have bases for our Navy and for our merchant marine throughout the world as a part of our naval and commercial system, the less people we have attached to them the better. That was the great advantage in the Hawaiian Islands. The importance of those islands was admitted by everybody, and the great advantage we had was that there was attached to them only a small and insignificant population.

I contend that although we want a naval base and a commercial base in the Orient, we want with it as few people attached to it as possible. We want an ideal commercial and naval base, such as there is at Hongkong, separated by water from the shore of China, and with as few people attached to it as possible. We do not want a naval base with 7,000,000 people attached to it, as we will have attached to it if we permanently retain the Philippines.

It seems to me that the time to consider this question is now, and that we should not drift gradually into the expenditure of large sums of the public money in places where we will absolutely be compelled to surrender the improvements when we surrender the islands.

Subig Bay is in the north part of Luzon, nearer Hongkong than Manila. It has an incomparable harbor. It has in the surrounding country almost no population. It is divided from the adjoining country by a high range of mountains, so that it is easily defended.

It seems to me that either Subig Bay or the island of Batan has a great advantage over Cavite; and if Congress does not consider this question we will find that in the Army appropriation bills we will be gradually drifting into enormous expenditures at Cavite.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CLASSIFICATION OF TEXTILES IN THE PHILIPPINE TARIFF.

Mr. LODGE. I now call up the bill (H. R. 13104) to amend an act entitled "An act to revise and amend the tariff laws of the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1905.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 12707.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside until the present bill is considered, provided it does not provoke discussion.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Without objection, it is so ordered. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill which has just been read?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUNISHMENT FOR HAZING AT NAVAL ACADEMY.

Mr. HALE. I should like to ask the Senate to take up now Senate bill 3899. It is the bill known as the "hazing bill."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a bill which will be read.

Mr. HALE. I do not expect that the bill will give rise to any debate, and it is very important that it should be passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill (S. 3899) granting authority to the Secretary of the Navy, in his discretion, to dismiss midshipmen from the United States Naval Academy and regulating the procedure and punishment in trials for hazing at the said academy; and, there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, it is impossible for anyone to understand fully such bill merely from hearing it read at the desk. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Maine, if it is in line with the letter of the President concerning this matter some time since? I do not know that I ought to ask if it is the result of the President's letter, but I ask if it is in line with it. Then I would know something more about what is in the bill.

Mr. HALE. The bill, which was reported from the committee and which is now before the Senate, was perfected by the committee on consultation with the Secretary of the Navy before the President's letter; but it contains all the suggestions which were afterwards made by the President, and possibly something more. The letter of the President to the chairmen of the two Committees on Naval Affairs was after the bill had been perfected by the committee in consultation with the Secretary of the Navy.

I will say that the whole sum and substance of the bill is that it provides what has never been before provided for, a gradation of punishment. It has been found by an examination of old statutes that upon court-martial or upon any proceeding touching misdemeanors and offenses at Annapolis, there is but one iron rule, and that is dismissal. There is no discretion. The offense may be slight, it may be trivial, it may almost be excusable, but the rule of punishment is stern and unyielding; it must be dismissal.

This bill, which was prepared by the committee in full consultation with the Secretary of the Navy, provides that upon minor offenses the discretion is left to adjust the punishment. If a boy at Annapolis has been guilty of some slight infraction and it is not a clear, glaring case of insubordination, the Secretary, on consultation with the Superintendent, may adjust the punishment. He may grade it; he may provide that there shall be certain demerit marks or that the offending party shall be subject to his adjudication upon the real facts of the case.

I think the bill ought to pass. The subject has excited a great deal of attention. It is intended to remove what is at present a very important and troublesome difficulty. If you must give the extreme punishment in all cases it is difficult to get any punishment. The bill is drawn upon that theory. It is left to the discretion of the Secretary on consultation with the Superintendent.

Mr. TELLER. Then I understand it contains something more than merely the question of hazing, that is to say, an offense different from hazing, may be punished as the Secretary of the Navy thinks proper.

Mr. HALE. No; that is not comprehended in the bill. The bill defines what hazing is—the exercise of improper power by one person or one class upon another. Perhaps an amendment may be offered, but the committee does not report anything in the bill except in relation to hazing, and it defines what hazing is.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to ask the Senator if he believes that the bill will prevent hazing in its present condition?

Mr. HALE. I think the agitation and the investigation of this subject will operate very much as the investigation into the conditions at West Point did some years ago, and that practically hazing will disappear. If I did not believe that I would have very little faith in the bill. I think in connection with the public feeling which has been manifested and the desire of Congress to do something that shall relieve the situation, the influence upon the midshipmen and the officers there will be such that hazing will practically disappear. That is the hope and belief of what will result not only from this bill but from the agitation in the country that has come up.

Mr. TELLER. I may be in error, but I am impressed with the idea that largely the fault of the continuous hazing in that school is due to the indifference which the officers of the school exhibit and feel toward what I think is a very serious offense.

Mr. HALE. The Senator is right there; and a provision in the bill covers that very thing.

Mr. TELLER. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. HALE. I wish the Secretary would read that provision of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Maine kindly indicate the portion of the bill he wishes to have read?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is section 4.

Mr. HALE. Yes; section 4—an amendment of the committee to section 4.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The SECRETARY. Amend section 4 by inserting, after the word "entitled," in line 19, the following proviso:

Provided, That it shall be the duty of every professor, assistant professor, academic officer or instructor, as well as every other officer stationed at the United States Naval Academy, to promptly report to the superintendent thereof any fact which comes to his attention tending to indicate any violation by a midshipman or midshipmen of any of the provisions of this section.

Mr. HALE. That amendment was deemed by the committee as very important, and it covers the suggestion of the Senator from Colorado. I do not think the bill would be complete without that provision being included.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I only want to say that I have not had an opportunity to look at this bill. I think the condition some years ago at West Point was simply disgraceful. I believe that was dealt with and that, substantially, hazing has ceased at that place. If the officers of any of these institutions take hold of hazing as they ought to do, it could be stopped without any statute. I am glad the committee have reported something in this direction, for the condition at Annapolis was simply disgraceful, and I think the feeling has been pretty strong that we had either to stop that practice or else we ought to dismantle the institution.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, I just came into the Chamber when this bill was being discussed by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I do not know precisely what the provisions of the bill may be, nor whether it is the only bill which will be taken up for discussion on this subject. This bill seems to be directed only to the matter of the punishment of hazing, and not for the determination of what shall be considered as hazing, although I think there is a section which denominates what hazing shall be.

Mr. President, the point I want to make is this: I desire to see amended either the law as it now exists or some other bill that shall pass this Congress, which will provide that any person who submits to hazing, willingly submits to it, shall also be dismissed. We attempt, Mr. President, to send to these academies the very best of our young men. We are educating them at the Government expense for soldiers and sailors. I know that I, having authority to recommend any young man, would never for a moment recommended one who I thought would submit, under any circumstances, to any of the hazings which we have seen discussed in the papers, and if I thought he was of such character that he would do so, I should consider that he would be absolutely unfit as an American soldier or sailor. These boys are educated at the Government's expense. The intent is to procure good men and brave men, and I do not feel that any boy who will submit willingly to the indignities that we have heard of in reference to hazing should be educated at all at the Government's expense. I do not believe that he should become an officer of the American Army or the American Navy.

Whatever bill or law we may have upon this subject, I should hope that it would affect the hazee, if he is a willing one, as well as the hazer.

Mr. HALE obtained the floor.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

Mr. HALE. I will yield to the Senator from Nevada in a moment.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Very well.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] discloses to me what is the danger of our attempting to go too far in this matter. The bill reported by me from the Committee on Naval Affairs is a conservative bill. It does not introduce any such elements as have been suggested by the Senator who has just sat down, because the committee did not believe it wise in this bill to go to extremes, but thought it better to provide a general law defining hazing, including the responsibility of the officers of the institution, which is very great, and then leaving the punishment to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy upon conference with the Superintendent of the Naval Academy. There were other extreme suggestions brought before the committee, but we did not believe it wise under present conditions to embody them, and I doubt whether it would be wise now in this bill, which is intended to remedy existing conditions, to incorporate any further and extreme provisions.

I now yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] whether it would not be possible to incorporate into this bill a provision relative to the men who have already been convicted, so that this act could operate on them just as it will upon those who commit similar offenses in the future.

In this connection, let me say that Mr. Coffin, who is a young midshipman recently dismissed from the Naval Academy under court-martial proceedings, is a resident of my State. He is the son of a lady, the widow of an eminent lawyer of that State who died a few years ago, and she has had a hard struggle. Her hopes are wrapped up in this boy at the Naval Academy who has committed this offense of hazing, a common offense there, I understand. When charged with it, he admitted it with candor, he attempted no subterfuge or concealment, but pleaded guilty. There was no alternative whatever, and dismissal necessarily followed.

This legislation arises, as I understand, from the impression that the punishment provided by existing law is too severe. While the punishment of dismissal may be required in some cases it is not necessarily required in all cases. I ask if in this remedial legislation, if it is passed, it would not be fair to relieve this young gentleman from the operation of the existing law and leave him at the academy subject to punishment for his offense by the Superintendent of the academy. If his offense warrants dismissal let dismissal follow; if his offense warrants milder punishment, then let him be punished under this law. I ask the Senator whether an amendment could not be inserted to that effect?

Mr. HALE. I am very glad the Senator has made that inquiry.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I want to say in this connection that there is a similar case from my own State to that which has been referred to by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], of a young man by the name of De Saussure, whose mother is a widow, and whose case appeals to me very strongly. I am, however, unwilling to join with the Senator from Nevada in asking the Senate to take any action, for the simple reason that the President, in the exercise of his supreme authority in such cases, has already seen fit to pardon certain of these young men who had been convicted and expelled. As he has put his hand to the plow, I am willing for him to continue.

But I want to call attention to the fact that, in my judgment, the present unfortunate situation at Annapolis is due entirely to meddling on the part of the Senate and the House of Representatives and of the Executive in the affairs of the academy some years ago.

Mr. HOPKINS. Before the Senator leaves that point, I wish to ask does the pardoning of a midshipman restore him to his former position?

Mr. TILLMAN. If the pardon so says. I saw that some midshipman had been pardoned and had rejoined his class and graduated the other day.

Mr. HALE. A pardon is an obliteration.

Mr. SPOONER. It is oblivion.

Mr. HOPKINS. I so understand, but it does not restore a midshipman to his position in his class, does it?

Mr. HALE. In some instances.

Mr. HOPKINS. A pardon is simply a forgiveness of the crime.

Mr. SPOONER. If the sentence is only dismissal, and that is all there is to the pardon, his offense is obliterated.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. The punishment is obliterated, but if the man was dismissed and was also sentenced to a term in the penitentiary, as officers of the Army and Navy have been, the pardon may go only to the remission of his imprisonment.

Mr. HOPKINS. But suppose it does not go to the extent that he is dismissed from the service and prohibited from ever holding an office of trust under the Federal Government, as most of these convictions are, as I understand, would the pardon in that instance not only permit him to have all the rights and privileges of an American citizen, but, in addition to that, restore him to his position in his class?

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will pardon me, I will undertake to say, without examination, that merely to be dismissed casts no stigma on a young man at all. He merely loses the opportunity of a lifetime to become a naval officer. It is only when a man is dishonorably discharged from the Army or Navy that he loses his citizenship and becomes something of a Pariah in that regard. As I understand the situation now, those young men who are under sentence of dismissal have no hope of any redress or any opportunity for restoration unless the President does pardon them or unless the Congress may meddle again, as it did some years back, and which, as I say, in my judgment, caused the very condition now existing, which we are seeking to remedy by this legislation.

I remind Senators that three or four years ago—I do not recall how far back, but very recently—several midshipmen were dismissed for very extreme cases of hazing, some of them brutal, and the friends of the victims in this body made appeals on this floor, and the President was appealed to, and, being naturally impulsive in the direction of giving "a square deal," or something of that sort, he sent messages down here urging Congress to take action for the relief of those young men; and I attribute the outbreak of hazing, or the revival of it and the spread of it there, to flow from that Executive interference and the interference on the part of Congress in dealing with the discipline down there.

This bill, as I understand it, has for its purpose, first, the definition of hazing, and, secondly, to put it in the power of the Superintendent and the faculty there, together with the Secretary of the Navy, to grade the punishment to suit the character of hazing; in other words, not to have an ironclad rule and say that every boy who is guilty of hazing, however innocent it might be, should have his head chopped off and retired to private life and not allowed to become a naval officer, even if it had been only some innocent amusement like most boys will engage in at times. If it is hazing, punish him according to the grade of the offense; and if it is a very bad case, one indicating brutality and the lack of that civil character which should attach to a naval officer, let him be dismissed. But I beg Senators not to meddle in this thing here except to pass this bill. Let the President exercise, as he has already exercised, his authority in his discretion to restore those young men who are dangling by the heels out in the cold, if he sees fit. If he wants to make flesh of one and fish of another, he must have some good reason for it; but I feel sympathy for his action in taking steps to mitigate the punishment and not cut off those young men from a career of usefulness and honor.

I hope that we shall not put in this bill some additional provisions that will encourage those fellows down there to keep on hazing and have them say, "Oh, no matter what we do, the President and the Congress will step in and relieve us, and we can go along with our deviltment just as we see fit, and that will be the end of it."

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] has struck at the root of this entire matter. The purpose of the committee is to have a practical measure that will operate an effectual good.

I call the attention of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS], who is an old, experienced, and careful legislator, to the undesirability of trying to make the provisions of the bill retroactive. Looking at it, or trying to look at it, in a practical way, I suppose if the bill passes as reported from the committee, with this distinctive proposition of the gradation of punishment, providing no iron rules, no Procrustean bed, that the President will, in a way, take that as a monition of what the desire of Congress is; and in cases that have come and are coming to him he will exercise the pardoning power, which lies in the Executive, largely in conformity with the provisions of the bill and the will of Congress as shown in the bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Will the Senator permit me to suggest right there that in this very case the President might not be willing to pardon Mr. Coffin, although he might, if he had the discretion, attach a less punishment to the offense than dismissal? The only remedy, if this bill passes in this form, so far as Mr. Coffin is concerned, is a pardon which would restore him to his old place; whereas, if my suggestion were carried out, the dismissal would be set aside and the President would then be at liberty to administer the discipline provided for by this act. If his conduct was such as to warrant dismissal, the President would doubtless dismiss him; if his conduct was such as to require a less punishment, he would probably attach the less punishment, such as reduction to a lower class, or something of that kind.

It seems to me very hard not to permit the President to apply to the cases already acted upon by the court-martial the same discretion he will apply to cases in the future. It seems to me, if the Senator is willing, that I could shape an amendment to that effect, and that it would secure justice and at the same time carry out the intent of this bill.

Mr. HALE. I can only say, Mr. President, that I think it is important that the bill should pass. I think it will be a solution of these troubles; but if we undertake to go farther, I think we will fare worse. I hope the Senate will pass the bill as it is. I do not think I am actuated by any pride of opinion or feeling that the knowledge of the committee is superior to that of everybody else; but the committee examined the bill with great care and reported it in the belief that, if it is not interfered with and passes, as I suppose it is likely to pass, the other House, it will effectuate a solution of this difficulty.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I should like to get the views of the chairman of the Naval Committee as to the effect of the pardon of one of these cadets by the President. There are other cases aside from the one suggested by the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS]. It happens that one of the brightest and most intelligent members of the graduating class was from Illinois.

He had a trial and was recommended for dismissal. The class in which he should have graduated has been graduated from the academy, and he has been hung up by that trial. If this bill becomes a law and it is left for the President to do as suggested by the chairman of the Naval Committee, I should like to know what effect that will have upon the young man from my State?

Mr. HALE. I will say to the Senator that I do not know. The committee did not think it wise to go into the general question of what shall be the extent of the pardoning power; but it did think it wise to establish as the law that extreme punishment as now visited upon every offending cadet, however light his offense, should not be inflicted, and that it should be left in the discretion of the Department. The committee did not go into the question—it was, I think, not called upon to go into the question—of the extent and result of the pardoning power. If we undertake to deal with that, we shall never get a bill to suit everybody. There are cadets from my State that are greatly interested and their friends are greatly interested in the proceedings of the courts-martial and their sentences, but I do not think it advisable because of that that the committee should report a bill that will cover a particular case.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HALE. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to state to the Senator from Maine, and also the Senator from Illinois, that the pardoning power is a constitutional power that inheres in the office of the Presidency, and any legislation we might enact could not divest the President of the power or in any way change his right to grant a pardon.

Mr. HALE. That is what the committee thought.

Mr. NELSON. And the President has full power, notwithstanding any legislation that we might enact here, if he wishes to grant a pardon, and our saying so by legislation would not give him additional power.

Mr. HALE. That was the view of the committee.

Mr. HOPKINS. There is no question as to the correctness of the position taken by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], but that does not meet the proposition. Of course, the President has the constitutional power to pardon one of these young men who has been dismissed from the Naval Academy or to pardon a man charged and convicted of crime. But the point that I am getting at is as to what effect that pardon will have upon the fortunes of the young man who has been dismissed from the academy.

The suggestion was made by some Senators here that the pardon by the President would restore the young man to his position in the class. Having some doubts about that myself, I appealed to the longer experience of the Senator from Maine, who has charge of naval affairs in the Senate, to get his judgment as to the effect of a Presidential pardon. The reason I did that was because the Senator from Maine suggested to the Senator from Nevada that it is unnecessary to amend this bill; that the cadets who have been dismissed could be taken care of by the pardoning power; but if it shall turn out that the pardoning power is simply to relieve them from the disabilities of a conviction, without restoring them to their rank in their class, then there are some of these young men who certainly ought to be protected by legislation of Congress if we are to enact into law the bill that is now proposed by the chairman of the Naval Committee.

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. TILLMAN addressed the Chair.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield?

Mr. HALE. I yield to the Senator from New Hampshire.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, in connection with this unfortunate condition of things at Annapolis, a young man from my State, bearing the name of Stephen Decatur, a name that is well known in the annals of our country, has been dismissed from the academy. He was tried for hazing and not convicted; he was then tried for encouraging hazing and was convicted and dismissed. There is not a citizen of my State who does not want that young man to become an officer of the Navy. He stood sixth in his class, and would have been graduated in a few weeks had not this unfortunate thing happened to him. As a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, I felt extremely anxious that, if it could be done in the bill that is now under consideration, some provision should be made whereby that young man and others similarly situated might have relief.

It seems very hard that those young men should suffer, and that other young men who are in the class below them, some of them doubtless equally guilty of hazing, should by legislation be placed beyond the power of summary dismissal; but yet, as a member of that committee, I was fully persuaded that it was impracticable, and very likely impossible, to do anything by legislation to alleviate the condition that Decatur and others are now in. For that reason I gave my consent to have this bill reported, feeling that it was a step in the right direction. It is recommended by our most excellent Secretary of the Navy, and, beyond a question, it will result in a very much better condition of things so far as the administration of the Naval Academy is concerned. I join, Mr. President, in the hope of the chairman of the committee that the bill may be passed.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. McCREARY. I desire to ask the Senator from New Hampshire if he believes that granting a pardon to any of these young men who have already been dismissed would restore them to the position they occupied before they were dismissed?

Mr. GALLINGER. Of course, Mr. President, it can not restore the men who were about to gradute to their class, because, as in the instance of young Decatur, their class may have graduated. Whether or not it would enable them to take their places in the academy in the next class that will be graduated I am not prepared to say. It has been suggested to me that a pardon would not even give them that privilege.

Mr. McCREARY. I desire to say to the Senator that I gave a good deal of attention to that branch of the case when the case of John Paul Miller was under consideration. He was dismissed on account of the court-martial finding against him. I went before the President, and the President granted a pardon in his case before the dismissal was approved by the Secretary of the Navy. From my investigation of the case I believe that, after a court-martial finds against a cadet at the United States Naval Academy and the finding is approved by the Secretary of the Navy, the granting of a pardon will not restore him to his position in the United States Naval Academy.

Mr. GALLINGER. If that be so—and I am inclined to think it is correct—the Senator will agree with me that no legislation that we could enact here would of a certainty reach that end, much as we might desire it.

Mr. SPOONER. Why not?

Mr. GALLINGER. I should think not. We certainly could not restore him to his class, for, as I have stated, his class has graduated.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. GALLINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I beg leave to differ with the Senator from New Hampshire upon that proposition. I think that a properly worded paragraph in this bill can reach just such cases as the one of the cadet from Nevada and the cadet from Illinois, and that Congress can restore these young men to their positions in their classes, or if they are in the position of Mr. Miller, whose class has graduated, that Congress can authorize their diplomas to be given to them and restore them to their positions in the Navy.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New Hampshire yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. GALLINGER. I was about to conclude. I was simply going to add that I will not enter into a controversy as to how far Congress can relieve the disabilities under which midshipmen like Decatur are now placed. I am not clear about it, and on that point I would defer to the better judgment of the distinguished lawyers who are discussing the bill. Certainly if there is any means of relief for these young men I hope it will be invoked.

Mr. McCREARY. Before the Senator from New Hampshire takes his seat I want to call his attention to a bill that was passed at the last session, I believe. I think three young men had been dismissed and there was a bill passed to restore them to the position in the Army that they would have held had they not been dismissed.

Mr. GALLINGER. I recall that legislation, but before these young men were restored by Congress they were pardoned by the President. I wish simply to add that, after due consideration of this matter, I fully coincide with the view that the chairman of the committee holds, that we had better pass this bill, and then, if the other question is to be taken up, let it be taken up later on in a separate measure.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, the President has already acted in one or two cases—perhaps there were three, I do not recall the exact number—and granted clemency, thereby restoring those young men. I want to say to the Senator from Illinois that I am as deeply concerned about a young man from my State, Mr. De Saussure, as he can possibly be about his friend. But I do not want to go from bad to worse, and keep on undoing here by legislation what is attempted to be done at the academy in the way of discipline. I contend that the present unfortunate condition is due entirely to the interference by the Executive and Congress in restoring those young men, because of maudlin sentiment, or pity, or charity, or something like that.

I want to make the point that it is a reflection upon the President to say you think he will grant a pardon in certain instances and refuse it in others of an identical character, unless there be mighty good grounds for it. If young De Saussure is not pardoned, or if the friend of the Senator from Illinois is not pardoned, or if the friend of the Senator from Nevada is not pardoned, the President of the United States will stand in the open to be criticised if the facts in the cases which he has pardoned are similar to those in the cases he does not pardon. I am willing to leave it with him in regard to all these past matters, and feel we can do no more now than to pass the bill seeking to remedy this condition of insubordination and hazing, which we are all trying to do, hopeful that hereafter there will be nothing of this sort come to us, but that in any case the punishment will be according to the grievousness of the offense and we will not have the hide-bound rule which causes expulsion for any reason whatever.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President, I have had no opportunity to look at the bill until within the last few moments. I find it proposes a very radical change in the existing law. The present law requires these young men to be tried by court-martial. The pending bill provides that they may be tried by a court-martial, and also that the Secretary of the Navy may dismiss them without a trial. The dismissal provided for does not depend upon hazing.

Mr. SPOONER. It may.

Mr. TELLER. It may, but it does not. Here is the provision:

> That the Secretary of the Navy shall have the power and authority, in his discretion, to dismiss at any time from the United States Naval Academy any midshipman whose continued presence at the academy he shall deem contrary to the best interests of the service.

That is an authority with which, so far as I am concerned, I have not much sympathy.

Mr. HALE. That condition arises in this way: Heretofore it has been considered, and it was so acted upon in the Department, that in flagrant cases the Secretary had the power of dismissal; and he has exercised it. It only applied, as I say, to rank, flagrant cases. An examination of the law and a reference to the Attorney-General for an exposition of the law resulted in an opinion that even in these extreme cases the Secretary had no discretion; that he must come to a court-martial; and the trouble was and is that if you go to a court-martial, whatever the case is, the cadet is dismissed. His career is arrested.

Now, in considering the whole situation, the committee believed that in these extreme cases the discretion which has always been exercised by the Secretary and never questioned until late years, should be continued, and that when you come to the specific offense of hazing we should define it, declare what it is, and then leave the punishment graded and in a way discretionary.

I do not suppose that the exercise of the power of the Secretary to dismiss will ever be, as it has never been, exercised except in very marked and outrageous cases, all the more if this bill is passed, leaving the punishment for hazing graded. That is the reason why that provision is found there.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know whether I understood the Senator or not. I do not understand that as the law now stands the Secretary of the Navy can dismiss without a trial.

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. TELLER. He can not?

Mr. HALE. No.

Mr. TELLER. I understood the Senator to say he could.

Mr. HALE. No; it is just the reverse. It has always been considered that the Secretary had the power, and he has exercised it, but when the statutes were examined and the Attorney-General's opinion was invoked, he reported that the Secretary, even in the most extreme case, could not dismiss, but must go to a court-martial.

Mr. TELLER. I do not suppose he can. I doubt whether there is a college in the country which allows its president or the faculty to dismiss a student without some sort of hearing. There is a sort of a hearing provided for here, but not a trial. I know that in the State of New York no college president or college faculty can dismiss a student without a trial. There must be a finding by the faculty. They must give him a hearing. Then they may dismiss him, subject to an appeal to the board of trustees of the college. Now, this bill says:

> Provided, That before exercising the power and authority hereby conferred the said Secretary of the Navy shall inform, in writing, the said midshipman of his reasons for contemplating its exercise, and shall receive and consider any written communication which the said midshipman may see fit to submit in the premises within such reasonable time as may be fixed by the said Secretary of the Navy; and copies of the said papers shall be submitted as soon as may be practicable thereafter to the President and also retained in the Department for transmission to either House of the Congress if called for.

I have felt considerable temper on the question of hazing as it has been exhibited both at West Point, in the last few years, until recently, at least, and at Annapolis. If it was the old hazing which fifty years ago young men indulged in at college, it would not amount to very much; but certainly the exhibition at Annapolis recently has been the most brutal I have ever known or ever heard of with reference to the system of hazing. Originally, years ago, it was practiced practically at every college in the country, but it was practiced in a sort of buffoon way, to have a little amusement with the young man. On the contrary, they now treat the boy with great indignity.

I have a great deal of the same feeling that the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has. If I should send one of my boys to either of these academies, and he was hazed and did not fight, I would feel inclined to disown him. I think, under those circumstances, any self-respecting boy who could get hold of a club would be justified in using it; and I think he would be justified in some of these cases in using a gun, if he had it in his hand. While I want to prevent hazing, I do not believe you will ever do it by law. You will never do it until the faculty of the college is determined that it must not be practiced and there is knowledge on the part of the students that every young man who engages in it will bring down upon himself the condemnation of the faculty. Certainly you will never get rid of hazing when you have a faculty, as I believe you have at Annapolis, that winks at it, and, I would be justified in saying, almost encourages it, which allows the hazing to be done. Until you get rid of that spirit, hazing will continue.

I will take any steps that are fair to stop hazing, but I would not, I think, authorize the Secretary of the Navy, who is practically the head of that institution, or any other man, to dismiss, without a trial, a young man who may be charged with some offense which he has practically no opportunity under the pending bill to disprove, if the Secretary of the Navy believes, as he does before he gives him notice, that he ought to be dismissed.

Mr. HALE. What tribunal would the Senator suggest, except a court-martial, which is always provided?

Mr. TELLER. I do not suggest any except a court-martial. But here he may have the court-martial, if the Secretary says so. I would give the young man a court-martial, and I would dismiss him for hazing, whether it was violent or otherwise.

Mr. HALE. I would not go so far as that.

Mr. TELLER. I would, because we have a statute against hazing, and the cadet takes an oath of office that he will abide by the statutes of the United States. I think a young man who has been properly educated and brought up, unless he falls under the malign influence which I think every man who ever attended college knows exists in every college, will conduct himself properly.

The young men are forced into the hazing business, and are compelled to undergo indignities. Of course, as I said, we had hazing fifty years ago, but not of a character such as we have heard of recently. A young man was not compelled to be a serf and a waiter to the upper-class men, as they do at Annapolis, and the class would not be allowed to practically turn a man out of the society of his fellows if he should say "I have been improperly hazed." We were told that at Annapolis the other day so indignant was the upper class—the class about to graduate—that it said that if all those young men were convicted, the class was going to resign. They did not. That was a bluff. But they attempted it. That is all there was of it.

Mr. HALE. That has all been changed. The upper class have passed resolutions that they will quit hazing.

Mr. TELLER. And yet, if I am correctly informed, they ostracized one of the men of the lower class; they made life a burden to him until they got away.

Mr. President, I want to see hazing stopped, but I do not like to give this power to any officer whatever. A Senator has suggested to me—I had not thought of it, because I had not known that this power existed—the question whether or not that power can be given to the Secretary of the Navy, because, I suppose, the cadets are really in the Navy.

Mr. HALE. That is a mooted question.

Mr. TELLER. I do know it is not fair to say to any man at the head of the Navy, who would act in almost every instance at the suggestion of the superintendent, "You can blast the character of any young man, when he has not been guilty of any crime, if you do not think he is just the man who ought to be in the academy." He can turn him out because the color of his hair does not suit him or because his religious views are not in accordance with his own, or anything else, and the young man will be absolutely without redress. I think this bill ought to be amended so that no member of the school shall be turned out upon a charge until he has had a trial.

Mr. HALE. By whom?

Mr. TELLER. By court-martial.

Mr. HALE. That is already provided.

Mr. TELLER. No; it is not. The bill says the Secretary "may" give him a court-martial. That is what the bill says. I should say "shall" give him, and then I would add to it that if the cadet is guilty of hazing he shall be dismissed.

Mr. HALE. I would not.

Mr. NEWLANDS. The Senator would leave the law as it is.

Mr. TELLER. No; I do not propose to leave the law as it is. For some offenses I should say that he should not necessarily be turned out of the academy. As it now stands, he can be turned out for a minor offense. I would make hazing one of the offenses which should cause his dismissal, if found guilty.

Mr. HALE. The Senator discloses what I begin to see is the hopelessness of the situation. Between the men who think we are going too far and others who think we are not going far enough, between those who believe that every form of hazing should result in dismissal and others who believe that some discretion should be left to the Secretary, I despair of securing any legislation. The committee has done its duty and submitted a bill; it can be criticized, it can be amended; but what the Senator from Colorado says discloses just the situation—between those who want more done and those who want nothing done nothing will be done. I am inclined to give it up.

Mr. TELLER. I want to say to the Senator that I would insist—that would be my view of good law—that a young man who violated his oath, violated a statute by hazing, should be dismissed. I would not make that imperative, perhaps. But I think it ought to be done. But I do not like myself to vote to put this unrestricted power in the hands of any man. Some of these young men who have not been found guilty of hazing, who have been perhaps the subject of hazing, may bring down upon themselves the condemnation of their associates, because it is regarded by some of the upper-class men as a great offense, if the under-class men report that they have been hazed; and the Secretary of the Navy, acting under the advice of the superintendent may conclude that this young man is a hindrance to the institution and he had better go out. I do not want that to be done.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Maine will not be too easily disturbed about his bill, or an effort to secure the passage of appropriate legislation along the lines which he has indicated in his observations. I do not agree at all with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] or other Senators who attribute the recent hazing at the Naval Academy to the action of the President some years ago in pardoning three cadets who had been dismissed for hazing, or to the action of Congress in providing legislation, in compliance with the President's recommendation, for their restoration to the academy. The President did precisely right in issuing the pardon, and, in my opinion, the Congress did precisely right in passing the bill for the restoration of the pardoned cadets.

The President exercised his power to pardon because of a fault in the legislation. The legislation of Congress was too stringent. It did not grade the offense of hazing. It did not discriminate between cases of hazing comparatively trifling and those which were of great enormity, not only involving humiliation, but danger and degradation to the object or victim of it. And this bill, in so far as it cures that trouble—and it does in large measure cure it—is wise legislation.

There was a penalty enacted in the act of 1874 to follow a conviction of hazing, but it was dismissal from the service, and "the cadet so dismissed from said Naval Academy shall be forever ineligible to reappointment to said Naval Academy." A man might be faultless in his class standing, he might possess every element to fit him for distinguished service in the Navy, and in one of those situations which confront young men gathered in college, whether it is West Point or the Naval Academy or one of the colleges in the States, a young man does something which technically amounts to hazing, not brutal, but hazing, and he is to be dismissed from the academy and is forever ineligible to reappointment in the academy.

Mr. HALE. The committee is trying to remove that very difficulty.

Mr. SPOONER. I understand.

Mr. HALE. That is old.

Mr. SPOONER. I understand.

The Senator misunderstood me. I am telling why the President issued these pardons and why Congress restored these men. It was because the punishment prescribed by law did not fit the offenses.

Mr. HALE. That is what we are trying to do now.

Mr. SPOONER. Ah, and I approve of that, but it seems to me you are going beyond that.

Under the spur of what happened at one of the academies a few years ago we passed a law, from which I will read. It was in 1903.

> That the Superintendent of the Naval Academy shall make such rules, to be approved by the Secretary of the Navy, as will effectually prevent the practice of hazing; and any cadet found guilty of participating in or encouraging or countenancing such practice—
> Whatever its form—
> shall be summarily expelled from the academy, and shall not thereafter be reappointed to the corps of cadets or be eligible for appointment as a commissioned officer in the Army or Navy or Marine Corps until two years after the graduation of the class of which he was a member.

Mr. HALE. That is keying up the old statute which the Senator has read.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. HALE. And we are trying to get rid of it.

Mr. SPOONER. I know you are trying to get rid of it by taking it out of the power of the court-martial to impose a sentence entirely disproportionate to the offense. But, on the other hand, you are giving to the Secretary of the Navy the power to expel a man from the academy without any trial, upon a correspondence with him.

Mr. HALE. Not for hazing.

Mr. SPOONER. Why not?

Mr. HALE. Because hazing is dealt with in detail, and the Senator as a lawyer knows that when in a statute there are provisions in detail for a particular subject-matter, they control.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator is a lawyer, and his proposition does not apply to this bill.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. Let us see. I approve entirely——

Mr. HALE. Suppose the Senator moves to strike out this provision.

Mr. SPOONER. I will in time, but I wish to call the Senator's attention for a moment, if I may, to this bill.

Section 3 of the bill is in part very wise. Is it very wise because it gives to the court-martial the power to discriminate between the different sorts of hazing and to grade its sentence according to the gravity of the offense? That is right. That is a great reform. If that had been——

Mr. HALE. What part of it is wrong?

Mr. SPOONER. I will tell the Senator if he will permit me.

Mr. HALE. I will.

Mr. SPOONER. I am making these few remarks.

Mr. HALE. So I see.

Mr. SPOONER. Not the Senator.

Mr. HALE. So I believe.

Mr. SPOONER. And the Senator will understand me in a moment; and I will be very brief, because I think the Senator himself will agree that the portions of this bill which are obviously right are enough, and that there has come from the Navy Department a recommendation for an amendment of the present law which ought not to be adopted by Congress.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. Now, let me go on for a moment.

Mr. HALE. Move to strike it out.

Mr. SPOONER. I am going to give the reasons why I think it ought to be stricken out.

Section 3 modifies existing law so as to permit an extreme sentence or a mild sentence by courts-martial for hazing, the offense of hazing being defined in the bill. But, if I may have the attention of the Senator for a moment, it not only modifies and makes elastic the provisions as to what a court-martial may do in the way of imposing penalties—imposing a light penalty or a very severe one, as the circumstances of the case may determine, which is right—but the bill goes beyond that and leaves it entirely at the discretion of the superintendent of the academy to have or not to have a court-martial for hazing in a given case, as he chooses.

I do not quite see, with these gradations of penalty, why one cadet should be entitled to a trial before a court—entitled to be defended by counsel, entitled to present witnesses, entitled, in other words, to be heard before he is condemned—and another cadet not be entitled to that right. It is left entirely in the discretion of the Superintendent of the Academy.

Mr. HALE. With the approval of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. SPOONER. Well, with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy; and the Secretary would, as a rule, probably approve the recommendation of the superintendent of the academy. These men are entitled to a trial or they are not. If one is, why are not all entitled to a fair trial before the same kind of tribunal?

It may very well happen under this proposition that the Superintendent may not see fit in his discretion to order a court-martial for the trial of John Jones for hazing, and yet upon his report to the Secretary of the Navy John Jones may be summarily dismissed for that hazing, trifling or great. In other words, it leaves it to the Secretary of the Navy and to the superintendent of the academy to determine whether a man guilty of hazing shall be dismissed by the Secretary without trial by court-martial or shall be tried before a court-martial.

That, Mr. President, is going far beyond anything that has been provided, so far as I know, by the statutes hitherto. It is not true as to West Point. Why should it be as to Annapolis?

Now, see what the Secretary of the Navy may do. From the day a boy enters the Naval Academy he has this sword of Damocles hanging over his head. Professors whom he does not like or who do not like him—some despotic official may give him a bad record from time to time, for they may give a man a standing as to conduct by reports to the Secretary of the Navy—put it in the power of the Secretary of the Navy to dismiss that cadet. What for? For hazing? It does not say. Not for want of scholarship, for that is provided for otherwise. If he fails in so many studies he is to be dropped unless the academic force recommends otherwise. If it is for any of the ordinary offenses, they are provided for. But he may be dismissed by the Secretary of the Navy when he thinks his "continued presence at the academy" will be "contrary to the best interests of the service." It will give one man or as many men as the Superintendent and the Secretary may see fit to favor with it this common right of trial, and the rest we leave to be decapitated by the Secretary himself. And on what sort of a proceeding?

That before exercising the power and authority hereby conferred the said Secretary of the Navy shall inform, in writing, the said midshipman of his reasons for contemplating its exercise—

That is very kind and considerate—and shall receive—

That is kinder still, and more gracious—

and shall receive and consider any written communication which the said midshipman may see fit to submit in the premises within such reasonable time as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Navy.

No review, no witnesses, a letter from the Secretary couched as he chooses, definite or general as he pleases, with a reply of the cadet. It complies with the statute if he notifies him that he thinks his continued presence at the academy is contrary to the best interests of the service.

It is giving, Mr. President, too much power, in my opinion, to the Secretary of the Navy, and I move to strike it out.

Mr. HALE. Well, let us have a vote. Let the amendment be read.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I shall not take up any time if it is not agreeable to the chairman of the committee; but——

Mr. HALE. Certainly; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to submit a few remarks in opposition to the motion made by the Senator from Wisconsin.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois will allow the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin to be read.

Mr. HOPKINS. Very well.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin will please restate his motion.

Mr. SPOONER. My motion is to strike out section 1.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all of section 1 of the bill, in the following words:

That the Secretary of the Navy shall have the power and authority, in his discretion, to dismiss at any time from the United States Naval Academy any midshipman whose continued presence at the academy he shall deem contrary to the best interests of the service: Provided, That before exercising the power and authority hereby conferred the said Secretary of the Navy shall inform, in writing, the said midshipman of his reasons for contemplating its exercise, and shall receive and consider any written communication which the said midshipman may see fit to submit in the premises within such reasonable time as may be fixed by the said Secretary of the Navy; and copies of the said papers shall be submitted as soon as may be practicable thereafter to the President and also retained in the Department for transmission to either House of the Congress if called for.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President, I do not agree with the criticisms on this section made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER]. I think instead of its being a measure that places arbitrary power in the Secretary of the Navy it is a most wholesome provision, and one that is intended not only to benefit the academy itself, but the cadets, who are subject to the law if this bill becomes a law. The provision states that—

The Secretary of the Navy shall have the power and authority, in his discretion, to dismiss, etc.

But it provides that before that power can be exercised by him a communication must be given to the cadet charged with a certain offense, setting forth all the specific facts upon which the Secretary of the Navy is to exercise this discretion. The cadet has an opportunity to make a full reply. That is made in writing, and before any final action is taken on the matter it is presented to the President of the United States. Of course, if it is not approved by the President, no action is taken in the premises.

Now, to provide against anything extreme being done or any wrong being perpetrated upon any cadet in the academy, the charge and the answer are to be filed in the Department, subject to the call of either House of Congress, so there is a check placed upon the Secretary of the Navy that will keep him from taking any extreme measures or from dealing in any unjust manner with any of the cadets, if any Secretary in the future should be so disposed.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The fact that such a check is required is argument enough against the lodgment of the power.

Mr. HOPKINS. I disagree with the Senator entirely upon that point, because it is all to be open and above board, and there will be a record made of it so that the world may know what it is.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. CULBERSON. Do I understand the Senator from Illinois to take the position that under the first section of the bill the President must approve or disapprove the action of the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. SPOONER. It does not say that.

Mr. HOPKINS. That is the practical effect of it. It does not say so in so many words, but that is the spirit of the section.

Mr. CULBERSON. The provision, I submit to the Senator from Illinois, is no more and no less than notice to the President of what has been done, and does not require his action whatever. Of course, in a sense the President of the United States is responsible for whatever action may be taken by the Secretary of the Navy; but if the section is to stand there ought to be an explicit requirement that the action of the Secretary of the Navy shall be approved or disapproved by the President of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Before taking effect.

Mr. CULBERSON. Before taking effect.

Mr. HOPKINS. I am speaking of the section itself. The Secretary of the Navy is required to make this report to the President, and while the language of the section does not say that it must be specifically approved by the President before action can be taken, every person familiar with Government procedure knows that if the President did not approve the action no action would be taken by the Secretary of the Navy himself.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. HOPKINS. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Let me say to the Senator the committee did not consider that that was a debatable question. The reference of it to the President is intended to carry with it his approval. There is not the slighest objection to putting in the words "subject to the approval of the President," but undoubtedly that would be the practical effect, even without those words being in. The Senator from Texas is right about that. There is no objection whatever to putting in those words.

Mr. HOPKINS. None whatever.

Mr. HALE. The committee did not for a moment think, when it was referred to the President, who, as Commander in Chief, has the control of the Army and Navy, that he would not have the power at once to veto it and stop it. There is no objection whatever to inserting the words "subject to his approval."

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Illinois yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HOPKINS. I will yield to the Senator; but I will say that I propose to take only a few minutes.

Mr. TILLMAN. I just wanted to help the Senator in his contention——

Mr. HOPKINS. Very well.

Mr. TILLMAN. By pointing to lines 7 and 8 on the preceding page, and let us take the whole subject-matter in a bunch or altogether. Do not let us run off to two or three lines here at the end without considering what precedes it.

Provided, That before exercising the power and authority hereby conferred the said Secretary of the Navy shall inform, in writing, the said midshipman of his reasons for contemplating its exercise, and shall receive and consider any written communication which the said midshipman may see fit to submit in the premises within such reasonable time as may be fixed by the said Secretary of the Navy.

Before exercising it those conditions must be compiled with. Then what follows?

And copies of the said papers shall be submitted as soon as may be practicable.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator from South Carolina allow me to ask him a question right there?

Mr. TILLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator think that that gives the midshipmen a right to appear before the Secretary of the Navy before he is dismissed, to be heard by himself or his counsel, and have a hearing and have all the facts presented, and go into a full trial?

Mr. TILLMAN. It does not contemplate a trial. We are endeavoring to hold a club up over these hazers with a view to having them understand that they have got to stop that devilment down there.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Senator think that a cadet ought to be dismissed without a full, a complete, and a fair hearing?

Mr. TILLMAN. This gives it to him.

Mr. SPOONER. In the discretion of the superintendent it does. It does not give it to him as a right.

Mr. TILLMAN. Where does the Senator from Wisconsin get that?

Mr. HOPKINS. If the Senator from South Carolina will permit me——

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course if the Senator from Illinois wants to proceed I will quit.

Mr. SPOONER. Section 3.

Mr. TILLMAN. Go back to section 1. Do not let us run back yonder.

Mr. SPOONER. It is not in section 1.

Mr. TILLMAN. We are discussing the question of dismissal now. I hope the Senator will bear with me a moment longer. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY] stickles for a trial. I do not want anybody to be beheaded without a trial or driven out of the academy without a hearing, but this provides that the Secretary of the Navy shall notify him of what he has been guilty and why he contemplates dismissing him. Then he replies in writing, or, if he wants to have his counsel—I suppose it would ordinarily be the Senator if he were from Georgia—the boy will have his day in court to make his defense. But before the Secretary can act he must submit the papers to the President. In effect, this is simply a provision that the President of the United States may, in his discretion, upon a due notice to a cadet, dismiss him. That is all there is about it, as far as I can understand the English language.

Mr. HOPKINS. As was said by the chairman of the Naval Committee, to meet the objection of the Senator from Texas a verbal amendment will cover that proposition. The spirit of the section is as I stated, and it will be administered in that spirit if it becomes a law in the form in which it was reported by the committee.

Now, to my mind, that is a wise and just measure, not only for the general public, but for the members of the naval school. I think there are instances where the Secretary of the Navy or the President should have the power to dismiss one of the cadets from that school without going through a court-martial. There may be something in the character and conduct of a young man that is demoralizing to other members of the class or to the school itself. It may be of a character where it would not be wise or wholesome to have a court-martial, and if this authority is lodged with the Secretary of the Navy subject to the approval of the President it meets the condition exactly.

Now, that is no greater power than the President exercises in other cases. The President appoints an ambassador to the court of St. James. He has a right to recall that ambassador. He appoints consuls to various foreign countries. He has a right to recall any of them without a trial. The President appoints these men to the naval school, and Congress should give him the same power to recall one of these appointments if, in his judgment, the best interests of the school demand it, that he has to recall an ambassador or to recall a consul or to exercise that discretion in any other department of the Government.

The section that relates to the court-martial is section 3, but Senators will observe that there, where there is a court-martial and the cadet is convicted, the pains and penalties of the law of 1903 are enforced, so that he is ineligible, if he is convicted, to a reappointment within the period of two years.

Under the first section no such penalties are inflicted. We know that there are grades of offenses in all schools where the penalties should be graded to the offense itself. There are grades in crime. We have in criminal procedure felonies and misdemeanors. We do not inflict the same degree of punishment for a misdemeanor as for a felony. The law should so provide that the President and the Secretary of the Navy can inflict different grades of punishment for the different grades of offenses at the school.

It seems to me that section 1 should be retained in the bill, and I trust that the Senate will vote down the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to strike it out.

Mr. HALE obtained the floor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. HALE. Yes; in a moment. Before the vote is taken, in order to perfect the section, on page 2, in line 5, after the words "shall be submitted as soon as may be practicable thereafter to the President," I move to insert the words "and subject to his approval." That is in the nature of perfecting the section before a vote is taken on striking it out.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment of the Senator from Maine will be stated at the desk.

The SECRETARY. In line 5, on page 2, after the word "President," insert "and subject to his approval."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. In the same line, to perfect the section, the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has an amendment which, I think, is a good one.

Mr. NELSON. I offer the following amendment, to perfect the section: After the word "communication," in line 1, page 2, I move to add the words "and testimony;" so as to read: "and consider any written communication and testimony."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think there is very much in the contention of the Senator from Wisconsin about having two forums for the trial of the same character of offense. It seems to me rather inconsistent with our idea of justice toward all men to provide a court-martial for the trial of some and to provide that others may be tried merely by the Secretary of the Navy or by the President, surrounding one with all the defenses and all the rights he would have in the trial of a case in court, depriving the other entirely of that trial.

It seems to me that the bill ought to be modified so that there could be but one method of determining the guilt or innocence of any one of these cadets. I myself would be probably in favor of a provision that the case might be tried by the Secretary, subject to the approval of the President, without resorting to a court-martial. I know of no further reason for having a court-martial to determine whether a student has disobeyed the rules of the academy, if it is a naval academy, than to have a court-martial try the question of the disobedience of the rules of any other college. It appears to me to be hardly in harmony with our idea that in an educational institution we shall call in the Army or the Navy to determine the civil or political rights of any person.

But I wish to say to the Senator from Wisconsin that if he should carry his amendment, where will it leave us? It will continue the old law. Now, what is the old law? The old law is that he shall be tried by court-martial. Under the law as it now stands, if a conviction is had it is dismissal, no matter how light the offense, no matter how great the offense.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator will note that section 3 provides for not only the penalties now denounced by statute, but a lot of very much milder penalties—very much less than dismissal for the offense of hazing.

Mr. McCUMBER. That might be all right. I think we should retain the provision which makes different kinds of punishment apply to different grades of an offense.

Mr. SPOONER. There is no law now that does that, but the bill, if passed, will do it.

Mr. McCUMBER. It certainly should do that. I call the Senator's attention to section 4, and we will see how broad is the definition:

That the offense of "hazing," as mentioned in this act, shall consist of any unauthorized assumption of authority by one midshipman over another midshipman whereby the last-mentioned midshipman shall or may suffer or be exposed to suffer any cruelty, indignity, humiliation, hardship, or oppression, or the deprivation or abridgment of any right, privilege, or advantage to which he shall be legally entitled.

We see it is "any unauthorized assumption." It seems to me that that is a pretty broad definition. I wish that we could modify it, but I do not know that it could be modified in such a way as to meet the conditions unless by inserting "willful or malicious," or something of that kind, so as to show the spirit in which it is done. In the hilarity of youth, in the spirit of fun, one student may abridge the rights of another and, under the letter of this section, he would be guilty of hazing. I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to the fact that no matter what the spirit may be in which any act is done, no matter in what playful mood it may be done, it is still hazing under this definition.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. May I suggest to the Senator that that is the point precisely where the discretion of the superintendent or the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy comes in?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is exactly what I want.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Then the Senator and myself agree. I thought the Senator was arguing that this was an ironclad definition which required the punishment of the man whenever it occurred, no matter what the spirit and the origin of it was. There is where the saving power of discretion in the Superintendent or the Secretary of the Navy comes in and relieves the law, making it elastic.

Mr. McCUMBER. The definition, Mr. President, is ironclad.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is true.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the judgment that is to be inflicted is not so.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It is discretionary.

Mr. McCUMBER. I desire that the provision shall be retained.

Now, before closing, I want to put another question to the chairman of the committee. When I suggested a short time ago that the law, in my opinion, should be so amended that it should include under this punishment any student who willingly submitted to hazing, and that he should also be discharged, the chairman stated that that would be an extreme provision. Mr. President, I admit that it might be extreme to some extent. I have read, I think, nearly all of these cases of hazing, and I have certainly been appalled to find that in every instance which I have read, the hazing has been done by a dozen or more, or a greater number, against one individual. It is of itself appalling to think that we should have any student so devoid of a sense of manly honor that he would be a party, in connection with a number of others, in taking advantage of a single individual. But it was equally appalling to me to find that the single man, or the one or two who were being hazed, submitted without any contest whatever. If a student will submit to hazing by two or three individuals—willingly submit to the character of hazing that we have had represented before the Senate—if two or three boys will go to another boy and say, "You stand on your head," and he stands on his head until he faints and there is no resistance, if that boy became an officer in our Army would not the same spirit of nonresistance, the same spirit of cowardice, manifested in that case, be liable to manifest itself when he might be met with an army three times the size of the one which he commanded? For my part, I do not feel much inclined to have the Government educate a student who shows such a disposition.

In addition to that, Mr. President, I am well aware, as every other Senator must be, that when a boy goes to the academy for the first time he may not know just exactly what his legal rights are. He may feel that even if he shows a spirit of resistance it may cause his expulsion; that he is not entitled to defend himself in an affray of this kind. So I would have this law, and have it so known that he is absolutely free to defend himself to any extent that is necessary and that he will be protected if he does so. When that is known, and he has that knowledge to back his own courage, I am inclined to think that in itself will be a great obstacle to hazing. So I do not feel, Mr. President, that there is involved in that an extreme measure. I am willing to admit, and I say so candidly to the chairman of the committee, that there might be danger of its abuse; but there would be less danger of its abuse on the part of the hazee than there would be of the abuse of the present law on the part of three or four who desired to engage in hazing.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I believe that legislation, where there is a dispute, as there is in this case, is always a matter of compromise. So I would suggest an amendment to section 3, which, I think, will obviate the objection which is made to section 1. I would add after the word "discretion," in line 22, on page 2, the following words, "or upon the application of the midshipman;" so that it would read:

SEC. 3. That the superintendent of the United States Naval Academy may, in his discretion, or upon the application of the midshipman, and with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, cause any midshipman, etc.

The effect of that amendment would be to leave the matter so that the offending cadet would have the privilege of being tried before one of two tribunals. He could submit his case, if he so desired, to the Secretary of the Navy and the President, and have it disposed of in that way; or, if he were dissatisfied with that method of procedure, he could have it tried by a court-martial.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Minnesota desire to have his amendment stated at the desk?

Mr. HALE. When we reach that section the Senator can have it stated. I will say that I see the force of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. NELSON. I think the amendment should be considered in connection with the motion to strike out the first section.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Then the Senator will offer it later?

Mr. NELSON. I will offer it later, Mr. President.

Mr. HALE. That is right.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. President, I am always disposed to follow a committee which has a particular measure in charge, but it occurs to me that there is much force in the suggestion and in the motion which has been made by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] to strike out the first section of this bill. I take it as undoubted that, with the exception of hazing, as I understand—I am speaking in general terms—the rule with reference to discipline at the Naval Academy and the law on the subject of hazing which is in existence now, and which this bill provides for, will be sufficient to remedy any existing evils at the academy.

But, Mr. President, this bill goes further than that. This bill takes an additional step and confides authority to the Secretary of the Navy, with the approval of the President, as now provided in the first section of this bill, by which a cadet or a midshipman may be dismissed, when the statute itself expresses, but does not define, the offense for which he shall be dismissed.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. If the Senator will pardon me and let me state it a little more fully, we know what "hazing" is, because it is defined; we know in a sense what is "a breach of military discipline" in the Army and the Navy; we know what such conduct is under the rules and regulations of the Army and Navy, for which a man may be tried and dismissed from service for conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman; but this statute does not stop, Mr. President, with those extreme definitions. It clothes the Secretary of the Navy, with the approval of the President, with the power to dismiss at any time, in his discretion, from the United States Naval Academy any midshipman "whose continued presence at the academy he shall deem contrary to the best interests of the service."

Mr. President, it is enough to have one-man power; it is enough to clothe two men with power, as this first section does here, but I submit that it is going too far to clothe them with unbridled license to dismiss a midshipman from the academy when the statute itself does not define the offense even in general terms.

Mr. HOPKINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLAY in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. HOPKINS. I desire to call to the attention of the Senator from Texas the proviso which requires that the Secretary of the Navy, before any action shall be taken at all, shall advise the cadet of the character of the offense with which he is charged, and then he has an opportunity to make reply to that. So he is not dismissed without he and his friends knowing the specific charge preferred against him. The amendments which have been made here also give him an opportunity to reply should evidence be taken on that point.

Mr. HALE. And not only that, Mr. President——

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand exactly what the Senator has said, and it has not escaped my attention.

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator permit me a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Of course, one sees the force of the suggestion which the Senator has made, but the amendment suggested by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], to which I do not object, is that in section 3, which provides "that the superintendent of the United States Naval Academy may, in his discretion," there shall be inserted the words "or upon the application of any midshipman." So that upon any case, no matter whether it be hazing or general wrangling, or whatever it may be, if the midshipman prefer that he shall be tried by a court-martial he has that option by the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota. The more I consider this matter—we have to marshal our thoughts as well as we can in the way of legislation during debate—the more I see the force of that proposition, and in effect it goes with section 1 and removes the possible danger of an oppression which section 1 might possibly visit upon the midshipman if upon any serious charge aside from hazing the midshipman, instead of being tried by the Secretary of the Navy upon notice and testimony, and that is analogous—as I go along my thought recurs to illustration—that is analogous to the general service in the Army and Navy. The officer himself may ask for a court of inquiry or for a court-martial, and in any case where it is proposed by the Secretary under section 1 to act and try a midshipman and condemn him, if there is the danger the Senator from Texas portrays and which the Senator from Wisconsin sees—if there is any danger of that kind it is all obviated by giving the midshipman the same privilege that the officer of the Army or of the Navy has in the higher rank.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CULBERSON] is entitled to the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY]?

Mr. CULBERSON. I yielded to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], and if agreeable to that Senator I will now yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. HALE. Very well.

Mr. McCREARY. I understood the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to say that, with this proposed amendment of section 3, the cadet would have the right to ask for a court-martial in any case. I think if the Senator will read the section carefully he will find that it only relates to hazing. The section reads as follows:

SEC. 3. That the superintendent of the United States Naval Academy may, in his discretion and with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, cause any midshipman in the said academy to be tried by court-martial for the offense of hazing, etc.

It does not apply to anything else.

Mr. HALE. I think the Senator is right about that; but the amendment of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] can be applied to another section, I think.

Mr. CULBERSON. That was the answer, Mr. President, I intended to make, of course, because it is the clear answer, that section 3 only has reference to hazing. But, Mr. President, I go beyond that. As I stated a moment ago, the laws and rules of discipline with reference to the academy are generally conceded to be sufficient now, with the exception of the hazing provision of this bill. It seems to follow logically, Mr. President, at least to my mind, that we ought not to go beyond that and to place section 1 in this bill, which, as I have said, not only gives one-man power, but it gives absolutely and unrestrained one-man power, which ought not to be permissible in a free government. Accordingly, I believe, Mr. President, that there is no necessity for section 1. That is a dangerous power to confide to any one man or any two men, and I believe the motion of the Senator from Wisconsin to strike it from this bill should obtain.

Mr. McCREARY. Mr. President, I have given some attention to the existing law embraced in the act of 1874 and the act of 1903. I think the existing law is too severe, but I do not think it sufficiently comprehensive. I am in sympathy with the bill reported by the committee and now under consideration, if some amendments can be made to it. I will be in favor of the bill, if the same amendment is made applicable to section 1 that has been proposed by the Senator from Minnesota to section 3. If that amendment were made applicable to section 1, then a cadet would have the right to ask for a court-martial, and he would not be summarily dismissed, as is provided in section 1.

Section 1 has already been very much improved by the amendments which have been offered, and, in my opinion, it should not be stricken out. This bill—and I believe no one has mentioned this; at least I have not heard it—refers to two different offenses. The first section of the bill refers to "any midshipman whose continued presence at the academy he [the Secretary of the Navy] shall deem contrary to the best interests of the service."

The midshipman is appointed by the President. As has been well said, consuls are appointed by the President, and ministers and ambassadors are appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. I see no objection to the first section of the bill, provided you permit the midshipman to have the right to ask for a court-martial, if he so desires. I think the first section as it is drawn in the bill at present is too severe. I do not think the Secretary of the Navy should have "the power and authority, in his discretion, to dismiss at any time from the United States Naval Academy any midshipman whose continued presence at the academy he shall deem contrary to the best interests of the service." I think that is too much power to give to the Secretary of the Navy, even if you couple with it the provision that the action of the Secretary of the Navy shall be approved by the President. But if you permit the midshipman to ask for a court-martial, if he desires it, then I think the section would be proper. I can conceive that there will be other offenses, outside of hazing, which, for the best management of the United States Naval Academy, the Secretary of the Navy, with the approval of the President, should have the power to try.

Mr. HALE obtained the floor.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Maine yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. HALE. The Senator will excuse me a moment. Why would not this meet the point suggested by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. McCREARY]? At the end of section 1, insert these words:

And in any case arising under this section any midshipman shall be entitled, on his application, to trial by court-martial.

Mr. McCREARY. That is exactly what I suggested; and I am in favor of it.

Mr. SPOONER. With that amendment, I shall withdraw my motion to strike out the section.

Mr. McCREARY. I am in favor of this bill. I think the bill as proposed to be amended will be a good bill.

Mr. McLAURIN. Mr. President, as a counterpart to the amendment which has been offered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] and accepted by the chairman of the committee, I suggest that on line 10, page 1, after the word "reasons," the words "and evidence" be added.

Mr. SPOONER. The words "and testimony" have been put in already.

Mr. HALE. A similar amendment has been made.

Mr. McLAURIN. That was after the word "communication," on page 2, was it not?

Mr. HALE. After "communication" the words "and testimony" have been inserted. That covers the point even in larger measure.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not know about that. The words "and testimony" refer to the communication the midshipman shall make, and the amendment I propose to insert "and evidence," after the word "reasons," on line 10, relates to the notice the Secretary of the Navy is required to give the midshipman.

Mr. HALE. That is already in the bill.

Mr. McLAURIN. Then, I suggest an amendment on page 2, after the word "time," to insert "not less than ten days." I think some limitation ought to be put upon the time in which the midshipman shall be required to present his defense.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair would suggest that the Senate is proceeding somewhat informally. There are a number of amendments reported by the committee, and they, under proper procedure, would be first considered. A number of amendments are now proposed in advance of the consideration of the committee amendments. The Chair suggests whether it would not be better for Senators to withhold their amendments until after the committee amendments shall have been acted upon, and then propose their amendments in regular order, so as to avoid confusion.

Mr. McLAURIN. I was just suggesting the amendment to the chairman of the committee, as I think some time ought to be definitely specified, less than which should not be fixed by the Secretary of the Navy for the midshipman to make his answer. The Secretary of the Navy first makes up his judgment for the dismissal of the midshipman. He must base that judgment upon information, because in the nature of the case he can not ordinarily have any personal knowledge of it himself. Then he gives his reasons for dismissal. He communicates them in writing to the midshipman and gives him notice, and, as the Senator from Maine has stated, in addition to the reasons he gives him, he gives the evidence upon which his reasons are based. The midshipman, when he receives this notice, goes with his communication before the Secretary, who has already made up his mind to exercise the right of dismissing him, because he deems his "continued presence at the academy contrary to the best interests of the service." He ought at least to be allowed, when he goes before this prejudged officer—and I am not saying it with any disrespect to the officer, nor do I intimate that the officer would intentionally be unfair to him—but when he goes before this prejudged officer, who is fixing the time within which he must make his communication and prepare or present his evidence, there ought to be some time limit, less than which the Secretary of the Navy can not fix, for him to produce his evidence and present his communication and answer to the reasons that have been given for his dismissal.

Mr. HALE. What has already been done by inserting the words "and testimony," after "communication," on page 2, is that the midshipman shall have the benefit at this hearing of the testimony he can present. I have no objection, if the Senator thinks that it is adivsable, that the Secretary of the Navy, in the charges that are presented against the midshipman, shall inform him of the reason for contemplating the exercise of the right of dismissal and the testimony on which his action is based. I have no objection to that.

Mr. McLAURIN. With that amendment I will be satisfied. The midshipman will necessarily be compelled to present negative testimony.

Mr. HALE. Yes; I see no objection to that amendment.

Mr. SPOONER. You can hardly call that "testimony" within the legal sense which is taken in a man's absence.

Mr. McLAURIN. The midshipman would not necessarily take his testimony in the absence of the Secretary of the Navy; but the Secretary of the Navy would base his action on information, or——

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to the words "and evidence" being inserted.

Mr. McLAURIN. I do not care what the Senator prefers to call it. The information upon which he bases his reason for dismissal ought to be given to the midshipman in order that he may have an opportunity to answer it by his evidence and by his answer.

Mr. HALE. Use the word "evidence." It is merely a technical matter. Testimony which is admitted by the court, both sides having been heard, is evidence.

Mr. McLAURIN. Let the words "and evidence" be inserted after the word "reasons," on page 1, line 10.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 10, after the word "reasons," it is proposed to insert the words "and evidence;" so as to read:

Provided, That before exercising the power and authority hereby conferred the said Secretary of the Navy shall inform, in writing, the said midshipman of his reasons and evidence for contemplating its exercise, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. The Naval Academy has been governed hitherto, this punishment has been inflicted in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, and the academy has been living under the tyranny which has been so eloquently described here to-day, and the discipline of the academy has been exceptionally good, I think——

Mr. SPOONER. Except when it has been exceptionally bad.

Mr. LODGE. Until Congress undertook to arrange it. At this moment for all offenses except hazing the Secretary of the Navy has exercised this power on the rare occasions when it was necessary to exercise it. It seems to me, Mr. President, that in any educational establishment, whether it is at West Point or at Annapolis or in civil life, to secure proper discipline you are obliged to leave a very large power in the hands of the head of the institution and his associates. There is not a university or an academy or school in this country that could subsist one moment if every boy who was brought up for an offense had the right to have a trial by jury on demand.

It is necessary in educational establishments to have that power vested in the head of the academy. I think the discipline of the academy would probably be very much better and there would be quite as little chance of injustice if it was left wholly to the Superintendent and the officers associated with him in charge of the academy. The court-martial, if there is one, is made up from the same officers, and those who are immediately charged with the conduct and care of the academy are not likely to do injustice to these boys, especially when there is an appeal, first, to the Secretary of the Navy, and beyond him to the President of the United States.

Mr. TELLER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LODGE. I do; certainly.

Mr. TELLER. In regard to what the Senator says about the colleges of the country I desire to say, though I do not speak from any knowledge except of the State of New York, that under the law of that State—it was so fifty-five years ago, I am sure—every student who was dismissed had, by the enactment of State law, an appeal to the board of trustees of the institution.

Mr. LODGE. I did not say that. I said "had the right to demand a trial by jury."

Mr. TELLER. Oh, no.

Mr. LODGE. I took a court-martial to be an equivalent. The board of trustees is simply the highest governing power of the institution, and in the case of a cadet he has an appeal to the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy.

Mr. TELLER. Under the New York law, as I recollect it, they are required to give him a hearing. He must be charged with an offense and then given a chance to make his defense. If they found him guilty, dismissed him, or punished him in any degree, he appealed to the faculty, if he saw fit. Their decision was final.

Mr. LODGE. What I said does not conflict at all with what the Senator from Colorado has said.

Mr. TELLER. Then, I did not understand the Senator.

Mr. LODGE. I did not mean to deprive him of the fullest hearing before those charged with the government of the academy. It is this enabling him to invoke a court-martial, which it seems to me will not tend to promote good discipline—to provide that any of these boys may invoke a court-martial as against the authorities of the academy. In all the universities of which I have any knowledge, if a boy is brought up for punishment, he goes before the president and the faculty. He has his hearing of course, and perhaps in some cases there is an appeal to the governing board of the university—the trustees or the overseers or the corporation. But nobody would think for one minute of giving him a right to a civil trial.

These boys at the academy at West Point or Annapolis are not on the same standing with officers of the Navy. They are still boys in school, although under the law they hold a commission from the President of the United States.

Mr. SPOONER. Are they not officers of the Navy?

Mr. LODGE. They are, certainly. I said they held commissions from the President of the United States. But still they are boys. I think their offenses have been enormously exaggerated, and I think there is the same tendency to give them privileges and powers which are subversive of discipline in all universities or academies of which we have any knowledge. I think the system which has worked well at the academy has been the system under the control of the Superintendent and the officers of the academy, subject, of course, to the Secretary of the Navy and the President of the United States. Where they have been subjected to that control the discipline has been good.

Then Congress took up the matter of hazing and passed a series of statutes about it, and they finally passed one that is so inflexible and so severe and has led already to such gross cases of injustice that we find it necessary to make an alteration in it. Now, that we are going to alter the law, I sincerely hope we will do it in a reasonable way, along the lines which all experience has shown to be the proper lines in great educational establishments of this kind, bearing in mind the age of the midshipmen, that they are boys, and this is primarily an educational establishment, although it is under military discipline.

Mr. DICK. Mr. President, the Congress will make a great mistake if it treats the matter of hazing in the Military and Naval academies as the pranks of boys. The moment a boy takes the oath as a midshipman or a cadet, he becomes an officer in the Navy or in the Army of the United States, and should be treated as such.

Mr. LODGE. He still remains a boy, does he not?

Mr. DICK. That depends, Mr. President. He ought not to remain a boy. He ought to apply himself for the next four or six years to becoming proficient in the chosen profession which he hopes to follow throughout his entire career.

He has taken on responsibilities. He has taken on obligations. He has taken the oath to obey the laws, the regulations, and the orders of the institution in which he is being educated at the expense, not of himself or his friends, but of the Government, which seeks to make an officer of him and to fit him for the responsibilities of his office.

I admit, Mr. President, that I am somewhat of an extremist on the matter of hazing, having had something to do with the investigation at West Point. Again, it is a mistake to minimize the effects of that sort of thing in an institution of that character. It is subversive of discipline. It is worse. It is an educator in brutality and the breaking of law and the disobedience of orders.

I do not feel either that the reports have been exaggerated. On the contrary, I think they have rather been quieted, and the whole truth has not been and never will be fully known. I am free to confess that that has been my experience at one of the institutions of this character in this country.

I would, of course, give a young officer the fullest trial before a court-martial. I would give him every opportunity to defend himself in that court, as I would give the same opportunity to every other officer—yes, to any private serving in the Army or Navy of the United States—but upon conviction I would sentence him to the full extent of the law, because his crime is of a character entirely out of harmony with the dignity and the character and the responsibilities of the office which he holds.

I admit that this bill does not go as far as extremists would have it go, but, as suggested by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON], legislation is always a matter of compromise, and I am willing to accept this bill in its amended form as a step toward the curing of this infamous thing which goes on in these institutions and which we denominate hazing.

I can not quite agree with the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] that the boy who is hazed should be punished along with the hazer. That would be too much like punishing a man because he has permitted a highwayman to take his watch. The boy who goes to the academy, the stripling, the plebe, is the subject, not of the sports and pranks of his immediate classmates, but he is subjected to punishment and humiliation by those who have gone from the class in which he is about to enter and have learned all the tricks and perhaps perpetrated often before the same indignities and cruelties upon other members of the corps.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Will the Senator allow me right here?

Mr. DICK. I will.

Mr. MCCUMBER. From what he knows of students, from what he knows of human nature, are not the chances ten to one that a boy who would submit, without resistance, to being hazed is also of that character that he will easily become a hazer in turn?

Mr. DICK. I am satisfied that if the Senator from North Dakota thoroughly understood the conditions under which the boy is usually hazed he would hardly ask the question. He is the one selected victim of his class. He is brought into the presence of those whom, perhaps, he terms his superiors. He is subjected to all sorts of humiliation, with the understanding that unless he submits he will be punished in one way or another. Resisting it means to fight. But it does not mean to fight some man of his kind, some man of his build, some man of his strength. It always means some man superior in build and strength, the object being to punish the disobedient plebe.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Will the Senator pardon me just here again?

Mr. DICK. Certainly.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I do not think the Senator himself, if he looks back over his own boyhood, can recall a case or would be willing to admit that he, as an ordinary American citizen, we will say, would allow one boy or ten boys or fifteen boys to make him stand on his head for fifteen minutes without a fight. He would do the very best he could; and if he would not fight under those circumstances, I would not say he was a proper person for military service.

Mr. DICK. But it is looked upon by the boy coming into the institution as being one of the traditions of the academy, something that has been handed down for a century, something that every cadet has gone through, something that every officer has experienced; and he is made to understand that he has got to do it or leave the corps.

Now, another phase of this discussion, it seems to me, is pertinent here. Legislation is not only a matter of compromise; it is likewise sometimes a matter of experiment. When the inquiries were concluded at West Point, Congress did legislate. It put upon the statute books, not what the committee recommended, but its own ideas, of course, of the legislation necessary to cure hazing at West Point. In the years that have followed the passage of that law there has been but a single exception to the uniform observance of it at West Point, and that was a very trivial case, one which Congress subsequently cured, as I think rightly, by permitting the young man to return to his class and graduate. That is the only exception, so I am informed by the officers at West Point, to the observance of this statute.

The same statute has been enacted to apply to the Naval Academy at Annapolis, and in spite of it hazing has gone on there, if we are correctly informed, to a much greater and much more humiliating degree than ever obtained at West Point, showing that statutes alone do not do away with these offenses.

There is a provision in the bill which I think will be helpful. I call the attention of the Senate to it. It is found in section 4. It is an amendment which is submitted by the committee. It reads:

Provided, That it shall be the duty of every professor, assistant professor, academic officer or instructor, as well as every other officer stationed at the United States Naval Academy, to promptly report to the superintendent thereof any fact which comes to his attention tending to indicate any violation by a midshipman or midshipmen of any of the provisions of this section.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DICK. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio whether it is not true that even before the passage of this bill it was the duty of the superintendent and every officer connected with the Naval Academy to do just exactly what the amendment says they shall do?

Mr. DICK. It would seem, Mr. President——

Mr. CLAY. I should like to ask the Senator another question. If the superintendent and the officers did their full duty and carefully watched after the students, could they not, by their own acts, largely have prevented hazing in those institutions?

Mr. DICK. Answering the Senator from Georgia, I am compelled to admit that that would seem like a reasonable and effective remedy. But in order that it shall be done, in order that there shall be no mistaking of the duty of the officer, in order that we may further provide against hazing in these institutions, the committee has wisely sought, it seems to me, to amend this section of the bill in the manner in which I have just read. That, I believe, will go quite as far as any legislation which Congress may pass toward curing this evil.

Mr. President, I believe this bill goes as far as we can go now, not as far as I would if I could control it entirely, but as far as we can go with legislation of this particular character; and we are informed by those most responsible for the conduct of the institutions that this legislation is ample and will be efficient.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I wish to say one additional word in connection with this matter. I think the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DICK] are laboring under a misapprehension in one respect, as to the law. The Supreme Court has decided, in respect to cadets in the Military Academy, that they are not officers of the United States Army. The case came up in this way: An officer can not be dismissed from the United States Army without the approval of the President. In the case at West Point a cadet had been dismissed, and the Supreme Court held that he was not an officer of the Army, and hence his dismissal did not require the ratification or approval of the President. I think the principle that was laid down in that case would apply to a midshipman in the Navy.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I have no doubt he is quite right. I said the midshipman held the commission of the President, which I think is the case.

Mr. HALE. Let the amendments be considered in their order.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The first amendment reported by the committee will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 of the bill, line 8, strike out the words "twenty-eighth" and insert "twenty-third;" and in line 10, strike out "one" and insert "three;" so as to read:

SEC. 2. That so much of the acts approved June 23, 1874, and March 3, 1903, as requires the Superintendent of the United States Naval Academy, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in line 25, page 2, after the word "June," to strike out "twenty-eighth" and insert "twenty-third;" and on page 3, line 4, to strike out "one" and insert "three;" so as to read:

As provided by the act approved June 23, 1874, and such court-martial, upon conviction, may sentence such midshipman to any punishment authorized by the said act or by the act approved March 3, 1903.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, after the word "entitled," in line 19, to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That it shall be the duty of every professor, assistant professor, academic officer or instructor, as well as every other officer stationed at the United States Naval Academy, to promptly report to the Superintendent thereof any fact which comes to his attention tending to indicate any violation by a midshipman or midshipmen of any of the provisions of this section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has proposed an amendment, which will be stated.

Mr. HALE. It is to come in at the end of line 7.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 7, at the end of section 1, add a semicolon and the following words:

And in any case arising under this section any midshipman shall be entitled on his application to a trial by court-martial.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. That is not enough. I think that relates only to that section. It does not reach at all the court-martial for hazing, which is made discretionary by section 3. If the Senator will accept the amendment offered by the Senator from Minnesota, inserting, after the word "Navy," the words "or upon the application of the midshipman," it will make it all right. This amendment does not cure the trouble with section 3.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair invites the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to the fact that there is an amendment pending in line 22, page 2, section 3, which may cover the difficulty of the Senator. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "discretion," in line 22, page 2, insert "or upon the application of the midshipman."

Mr. SPOONER. Where does that come in?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. After the word "discretion."

Mr. SPOONER. It should come in after the word "Navy," in line 23.

Mr. HALE. Yes.

Mr. SPOONER. Otherwise it will be of no avail.

Mr. HALE. I thought that had been agreed to.

Mr. SPOONER. No, it has not been.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. After the word "Navy, in line 23, page 2, it is proposed to insert "or upon the application of the midshipman."

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from Wisconsin to withdraw his motion to strike out section 1.

Mr. SPOONER. I withdraw my motion, the section having been amended.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Nevada proposes an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as an additional section the following:

SEC. 6. The President may set aside the dismissal of any naval cadet for hazing during the past year. The judgment of the court-martial in such case shall stand in so far as it finds such cadet guilty of hazing, but the punishment may be modified, according to the provisions of section 3 of this act.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I will ask the Senator from Maine whether he will not accept the amendment?

Mr. HALE. I could hardly do that, acting for the committee. I am willing that the Senate shall take a vote upon it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then I will take a few moments to explain the amendment.

Mr. KEAN and others. Let us vote.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I have already referred to the case of Mr. Coffin, who was dismissed for hazing. We will assume that this bill was in operation when the court-martial found him guilty of hazing. Under it the Secretary of the Navy, if the offense were trivial, could attach a small punishment; if the offense were serious, he could order the dismissal of the cadet. Under existing law it is imperative that he shall dismiss the cadet.

Now, we will assume that at the very time Mr. Coffin committed his offense of hazing there was another naval cadet who took part in the offense, and we will assume that this bill had passed, and that the young man is brought before a court-martial for trial. If he were found guilty, then the Secretary could graduate the punishment to the offense, could reduce the young man one year in his terms, could imprison him, could do anything less than dismiss him, and if the offense were serious, of course could dismiss him. Now this amendment does not propose to entirely clear any cadet who has been convicted of hazing of his offense. The judgment of the court-martial stands. All that it permits is that the President and the Secretary of the Navy can suit the punishment to the offense, can give a modified punishment if the offense is slight, can adhere to dismissal if the offense be serious. It seems to me it is only just and fair under the circumstances.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. DRYDEN. Mr. President, my attention was diverted when the amendment was read. I should like to hear it again.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The amendment will again be read.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to add at the end of the bill a new section, as follows:

SEC. 6. The President may set aside the dismissal of any naval cadet for hazing during the past year. The judgment of the court-martial in such case shall stand in so far as it finds such cadet guilty of hazing, but the punishment may be modified according to the provisions of section 3 of this act.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment which has just been reported. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HALE and others (to Mr. NEWLANDS). Call for a division.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I ask for a division.

The Senate proceeded to divide.

Mr. HALE. I hope the Senator from Nevada, in view of its being so late, will withdraw his call for a division.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I withdraw it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The request for a division is withdrawn. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nevada.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. 15085) to set apart certain lands in the State of South Dakota to be known as the "Battle Mountain Sanitarium Reserve;" in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolution; and they were thereupon signed by the Vice-President:

H. R. 12320. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in the appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1906, and for prior years, and for other purposes; and

S. R. 28. Joint resolution to fill a vacancy in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution.

BATTLE MOUNTAIN SANITARIUM RESERVE.

The bill (H. R. 15085) to set apart certain lands in the State of South Dakota to be known as the "Battle Mountain Sanitarium Reserve" was read twice by its title.

Mr. KITTREDGE. I ask that the bill be placed on the Calendar in lieu of Order of Business 1180, which is identical, and that that order of business, being the bill (S. 4310) to set apart certain lands in the State of South Dakota as a public park, to be known as the "Battle Mountain Sanitarium Park," be indefinitely postponed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

Mr. HALE. I move that when the Senate adjourns to-day it be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

REGULATION OF RAILROAD RATES.

Mr. FORAKER. I desire to give notice that on Wednesday next, after the routine morning business, I will ask the indulgence of the Senate to submit to some remarks on the bill H. R. 12987, commonly known as "the railroad rate bill."

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. KEAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 26, 1906, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 22, 1906.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our heavenly Father, ever present in the hearts of Thy children to uphold, sustain, and guide them in every onward and upward movement toward the betterment of mankind, we thank Thee for our Republic and the men whose souls yet live in its sacred institutions, that to-day all over this broad land the name of George Washington will be extolled and his deeds recounted by the millions who hold his memory dear to their hearts. Great in war, great in peace, great in the integrity and nobility of his character; broad in his conceptions, firm in his convictions—the paragon of American manhood and citizenship. Monuments have been reared to his memory, encomiums have been pronounced upon his virtues, but the glory of our Republic rises in grandeur above them all and speaks in language more eloquent than tongue or pen of what he was and what he did. God grant that it may live and spread its influence to all the world, and Thine shall be the praise, through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, this is the anniversary of the birth of George Washington, of Virginia, the first President of the United States. I move, Mr. Speaker, that in commemoration of that fact the Clerk be directed to read the Farewell Address of George Washington to his countrymen——

Mr. PAYNE. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will proceed briefly by unanimous consent, and can only proceed——

Mr. WILLIAMS (continuing). And thereupon that the House adjourn.

Mr. DALZELL. The regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. Speaker, a motion to adjourn is in order, and having made that explanation, I move that the House do now adjourn until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WILLIAMS) there were—ayes 67, noes 113.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Upon this important matter, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 89, nays 136, answered "present" 11, not voting 147, as follows:
